dated on the 18th day of October, that immediately after the conventions of Cloſter-Seven and Bremeworden [m], the court of Verſailles had determined to change the government and ſyſtem of the electorate, contrary to an expreſs article of the capitulation granted to the city of Hanover, when it ſurrendered on the 9th day of Auguſt; and that the crown of France intended to take advantage of the ceſſation of arms, in ſeizing places and provinces which were not yet ſubdued; for, by the decree above-mentioned, the adminiſtration of John Faidy extended to the countries which might hereafter be conquered. With what regard to juſtice, then, could the French government charge the elector of Hanover with the infraction of articles? or what reſpect to good faith and humanity did the duke de Richelieu obſerve, in the order iſſued from Zell, towards the end of the year, importing, that as the treaty made with the country of Hanover had been rendered void by the violation of the articles ſigned at Cloſter-Seven, all the effects belonging to the officers, or others, employed in the Hanoverian army, ſhould be confiſcated for the uſe of his moſt chriſtian majeſty?

The landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, being deſirous of averting a like ſtorm from his dominions, not only promiſed to renounce all connection with the kings of Great-Britain and Pruſſia, but even ſollicited the court of France to receive him among the number of its dependants; for, on the 18th day of October, the miniſter of the Duc de Deuxponts, delivered at Verſailles, in the name of the landgrave, the plan of a treaty founded on the following conditions. The landgrave after having expreſſed an ardent deſire of attaching himſelf wholly to France, propoſed theſe articles: That he ſhould enter into no engagement againſt the king and his allies; and give no aſſiſtance directly or indirectly to the enemies of his majeſty and his allies: that he ſhould never give his vote, in the general or particular aſſemblies of the empire, againſt his majeſty's intereſt; but, on the contrary, employ his intereſt, jointly with France, to quiet the troubles of the empire: that, for this end, his troops, which had ſerved in the Hanoverian army, ſhould engage in the ſervice of France, on condition that they ſhould not act in the preſent war againſt his Britannick majeſty; that, immediately after the ratification of the treaty, his moſt chriſtian majeſty ſhould reſtore the dominions of the landgrave in the ſame condition they were in when ſubdued by French forces: that theſe dominions ſhould be exempted from all further contributions, either in money, corn, forage, wood, or cattle, though already impoſed on the ſubjects of Heſſe; and the French troops pay for all the proviſion with which they might be ſupplied; in which caſe the landgrave ſhould exact no toll for warlike ſtores, proviſions, or other articles of that nature, which might paſs through his dominions: that the king of France ſhould guarantee all his eſtates, all the rights of the houſe of Heſſe-Caſſel, particularly the act of aſſurance ſigned by his ſon, the hereditary prince, with regard to religion; uſe his intereſt with the emperor and the empreſs-queen, that, in conſideration of the immenſe loſſes and damages his moſt ſerene highneſs had ſuffered ſince the French invaded his country, and of the great ſums he ſhould loſe with England in arrears and ſubſidies by this accommodation, he might be excuſed from furniſhing his contingent to the army of the empire, as well as from paying the Roman months granted by the diet of the empire; and if, in reſentment of this convention, the ſtates of his ſerene highneſs ſhould be attacked, his moſt chriſtian majeſty ſhould afford the moſt ſpeedy and effectual ſuccours. Theſe propoſals will ſpeak for themſelves to the reader's apprehenſion; and if he is not blinded by the darkeſt miſts of prejudice, exhibit a clear and diſtinct idea of a genuine German ally. The landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel had been fed with the good things of England, even in time of peace, when his friendſhip could not avail, nor his averſion prejudice the intereſts of Great-Britain: but he was retained in that ſeaſon of tranquillity as a friend, on whoſe ſervices the moſt implicit dependence might be placed in any future ſtorm or commotion. How far he merited this confidence and favour might have been determined by reflecting on his conduct during the former war: in the courſe of which his troops were hired to the king of Great-Britain and his enemies alternately, as the ſcale of convenience happened to preponderate. Since the commencement of the preſent troubles, he had acted as a mercenary to Great-Britain, although he was a principal in the diſpute, and ſtood connected with her deſigns by ſolemn treaty, as well as by all the ties of gratitude and honour: but now that the cauſe of Hanover ſeemed to be on the decline, and his own dominions had ſuffered by the fate of the war, he not only appeared willing to abandon his benefactor and ally, but even ſued to be inliſted in the ſervice of his adverſary. This intended defection was, however, prevented by a ſudden turn of fortune, which he could not poſſibly foreſee: and his troops continued to act in conjunction with the Hanoverians.

The landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel was not ſingular in making ſuch advances to the French monarch. The duke of Brunſwick, ſtill more nearly connected with the king of Great-Britain, uſed ſuch uncommon expedition in detaching himſelf from the tottering fortune of Hanover, that in ten days after the convention of Cloſter-Seven he had concluded a treaty with the courts of Vienna and Verſailles; ſo that the negotiation muſt have been begun before that convention took place. On the 20th day of September his miniſter at Vienna, by virtue of full powers from the duke of Brunſwick, accepted and ſigned the conditions which the French king and his Auſtrian ally thought proper to impoſe. Theſe imported, that his moſt chriſtian majeſty ſhould keep poſſeſſion of the cities of Brunſwick and Wolfenbuttel during the war, and make uſe of the artillery, arms, and military ſtores depoſited in their arſenals: that the duke's forces, on their return from the camp of the duke of Cumberland, ſhould be diſbanded and diſarmed; and take an oath, that they ſhould not, during the preſent war, ſerve againſt the king or his allies: that the duke ſhould be permitted to maintain a battalion of foot, and two ſquadrons of horſe, for the guard of his perſon and caſtles; but the regulations made by mareſchal Richelieu and the intendant of his army ſhould ſubſiſt on their preſent footing: that the duke ſhould furniſh his contingent in money and troops, agreeably to the laws of the empire: that his forces ſhould immediately join thoſe which the Germanick body had aſſembled; and that he ſhould order his miniſter at Ratiſbon to vote conformably to the reſolutions of the diet, approved and confirmed by the emperor. In conſideration of all theſe conceſſions, the duke was reſtored to the favour of the French king, who graciouſly promiſed that neither his revenues nor his treaſure ſhould be touched, nor the adminiſtration of juſtice invaded; and that nothing further ſhould be demanded, but winter-quarters for the regiments which ſhould paſs that ſeaſon in the country of Brunſwick. How ſcrupulouſly ſoever the duke might have intended to obſerve the articles of this treaty, his intentions were fruſtrated by the conduct of his brother prince Ferdinand, who, being inveſted with the command of the Hanoverian army, and ordered to reſume the operations of war againſt the enemy, detained the troops of Brunſwick, as well as his nephew the hereditary prince, notwithſtanding the treaty which his brother had ſigned, and the injunctions which he had laid upon his ſon to quit the army, and make a tour to Holland. The duke wrote an expoſtulatory letter to prince Ferdinand, pathetically complaining that he had ſeduced his troops, decoyed his ſon, and diſgraced his family; inſiſting upon the prince's purſuing his journey, as well as upon the return of the troops: and threatening, in caſe of non-compliance, to uſe other means that ſhould be more effectual [n]. Notwithſtanding

[m] Six days after the convention was ſigned at Cloſter-Seven, another act of accommodation was concluded at Bremenworden, between the generals Sporcken and Villemur, relating to the releaſe of priſoners, and ſome other points omitted in the convention.

[n] Tranſlation of the letter written by the duke of Brunſwick to his brother prince Ferdinand.

'SIR,

'I know you too well to doubt that the ſituation in which we ſtand at preſent, with reſpect to each other, gives you abundance of uneaſineſs; nor will you doubt that it gives me equal concern: indeed, it afflicts me greatly. Mean while I could never, my deareſt brother, have believed that you would be the perſon who ſhould carry away from me my eldeſt ſon. I am exceedingly mortified to find myſelf under the hard neceſſity of telling you that this ſtep is contrary to the law of nations, and the conſtitutions of the empire; and that, if you perſiſt in it, you will diſgrace your family, and bring a ſtain upon your country, which you pretend to ſerve. The hereditary prince, my ſon, was at Hamburgh by my order, and you have carried him to Stade. Could he diſtruſt his uncle, an uncle who hath done ſo much honour to his family? Could he believe that this uncle would deprive him of liberty, a liberty never refuſed to the loweſt officer? I ordered him to make a tour to Holland: could not the loweſt officer have done as much? Let us ſuppoſe for a moment, that my troops, among whom he ſerved, were to have ſtaid with the Hanoverians, would it not have been ſtill in my power to give an officer leave of abſence, or even leave to reſign his commiſſion? and would you hinder your brother, the head of your family, and of ſuch a family as our's, to exerciſe this right with regard to a ſon, who is the hereditary prince, of whoſe rights and prerogatives you cannot be ignorant? It is impoſſible you could have deceived ſuch deſigns, without the ſuggeſtion of others. Thoſe who did ſuggeſt them have trampled on the rights of nature, of nations, and of the princes of Germany: they have induced you to add to all theſe the moſt cruel inſult on a brother whom you love, and who always loved you with the warmeſt affection. Would you have your brother lay his juſt complaints againſt you before the whole empire, and all Europe? Are not your proceedings without example? What is Germany become? What are its princes be-this warm remonſtrance, prince Ferdinand adhered to his plan. He detained the troops, and the hereditary prince, who, being fond of the ſervice, in a little time ſignalized himſelf by very extraordinary acts of bravery and conduct; and means were found to reconcile his father to meaſures that expreſly contradicted his engagements with the courts Vienna and Verſailles.

The defeat of the French army at Roſbach, and the retreat of the Ruſſians from Pomerania, had entirely changed the face of affairs in the empire. The French king was ſoon obliged to abandon his conqueſts on that ſide of the Rhine, and his threats ſounded no longer terrible in the ears of the Hanoverian and Pruſſian allies. As little formidable were the denunciations of the emperor, who had, by a decree of the Aulick council, communicated to the diet certain mandates, iſſued in the month of Auguſt in the preceding year, on pain of the ban of the empire, with avocatory letters annexed, againſt the king of Great Britain, elector of Hanover, and the other princes acting in concert with the king of Pruſſia. The French court likewiſe publiſhed a virulent memorial, after the convention of Cloſter-Seven had been violated, and ſet aſide, drawing an invidious parallel between the conduct of the French king and the proceedings of his Britannick majeſty; in which the latter is taxed with breach of faith, and almoſt every meanneſs that could ſtain the character of a monarch. In anſwer to the emperor's decree, and this virulent charge, baron Gimmengen, the electoral miniſter of Brunſwick Lunenbourg, preſented to the diet, in November, a long memorial, recapitulating the important ſervices his ſovereign had done the houſe of Auſtria, and the ungrateful returns he had reaped, in the queen's refuſing to aſſiſt him, when his dominions were threatened with an invaſion. He enumerated many inſtances in which ſhe had aſſiſted, encouraged, and even joined the enemies of the electorate, in contempt of her former encouragements, and directly contrary to the conſtitution of the empire. He refuted every article of the charge which the French court had brought againſt him in their virulent libel, retorted the imputations of perfidy and ambition, and with reſpect to France, juſtified every particular of his own conduct.

While the French and Hanoverian armies remained in their winter-quarters, the former at Zell, and the latter at Lunenbourg, divers petty enterprizes were executed by detachments with various ſucceſs. The Hanoverian general Juncheim, having taken poſt at Halberſtadt and Quedlimbourg, from whence he made excurſions even to the gates of Brunſwick, and kept the French army in continual alarm, was viſited by a large body of the enemy, who compelled him to retire to Acherſleben, committed great exceſſes in the town of Halberſtadt and its neighbourhood, and carried off hoſtages for the payment of contributions. General Hardenberg, another Hanoverian officer, having diſlodged the French detachments that occupied Burgh, Vogelſack, and Ritterhude, and cleared the whole territory of Bremen, in the month of January the duke de Broglio aſſembled a conſiderable corps of troops that were cantoned at Otterſburgh, Rothenburg, and the adjacent country, and advancing to Bremen, demanded admittance, threatening, that, in caſe of a refuſal, he would have recourſe to extremeties, and puniſh the inhabitants ſeverely, ſhould they make the leaſt oppoſition. When their deputies waited upon him, to deſire a ſhort time for deliberation, he anſwered, 'Not a moment—the duke de Richelieu's orders are peremptory, and admit of no delay.' He accordingly ordered the cannon to advance; the wall was ſcaled, and the gates would have been forced open, had not the magiſtrates, at the earneſt importunity of the people, reſolved to comply with his demand. A ſecond deputation was immediately diſpatched to the duke de Broglio, ſignifying their compliance; and the gates being opened, he marched into the city at midnight, after having promiſed upon his honour, that no attempt ſhould be made to the prejudice of its rights and prerogatives, and no outrage offered to the privileges of the regency, to the liberty, religion, and commerce of the inhabitants. This conqueſt, however, was of ſhort duration. Prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick being joined by a body of Pruſſian horſe, under the command of prince George of Holſtein Gottorp, the whole army was put in motion, and advanced to the country of Bremen about the middle of February. The enemy were diſlodged from Rothenburg, Otterſburg, and Verden, and they abandoned the city of Bremen at the approach of the Hanoverian general, who took poſſeſſion of it without oppoſition.

By this time the court of Verſailles, being diſſatisfied with the conduct of the duke de Richelieu, had recalled that general from Germany, where his place was ſupplied by the count de Clermont, to the general ſatisfaction of the army, as well as to the joy of the Hanoverian ſubjects, among whom Richelieu had committed many flagrant and inhuman acts of rapine and oppreſſion. The new commander found his maſter's forces reduced to a deplorable condition, by the accidents of war, and diſtemper ariſing from hard duty, ſevere weather, and the want of neceſſaries. As he could not pretend with ſuch a wretched remnant, to oppoſe the deſigns of prince Ferdinand in the field, or even maintain the footing which his predeceſſor had gained, he found himſelf under the neceſſity of retiring with all poſſible expedition towards the Rhine. As the allies advanced, his troops retreated from their diſtant quarters with ſuch precipitation, as to leave behind all their ſic, together with a great part of their baggage and artillery, beſides a great number of officers and ſoldiers, that fell into the hands of thoſe parties by whom they were purſued. The inhabitants of Hanover, perceiving the French intended to abandon that city, were overwhelmed with the fear of being ſubjected to every ſpecies of violence and abuſe: but their apprehenſions were happily diſappointed by the honour and intregrity of the duke de Randan, the French governor, who not only took effectual meaſures for reſtraining the ſoldiers within the bounds of the moſt rigid diſcipline and moderation, but likewiſe exhibited a noble proof of generoſity, almoſt without example. Inſtead of deſtroying his magazine of proviſions, according to the uſual practice of war, he ordered the whole to be either ſold at a low price, or diſtributed among the poor of the city, who had been long expoſed to the horrors of famine: an act of godlike humanity, which ought to dignify the character of that worthy nobleman above all the titles that military fame can deſerve, or arbitrary monarchs beſtow. The regency of Hanover were ſo deeply impreſſed with a ſenſe of heroic behaviour on this occaſion, that they gratefully acknowledged it, in a letter of thanks to him and the count de Clermont; and on the day of ſolemn thankſgiving to heaven, for their being delivered from their enemies, the clergy in their ſermons did not fail to celebrate and extol the charity and benevolence of the duke de Randan. Such glorious teſtimonies, and even from enemies, muſt have afforded the moſt exquiſite pleaſure to a mind endued with ſenſibility; and this, no doubt, may be termed one of the faireſt triumphs of humanity.

The two grand diviſions of the French army, quartered at Zell and Hanover, retired in good order to Hamelen, where they collected all their troops, except thoſe that were left in Hoya, and about 4000 men placed in garriſon at Minden, to retard the operations of the combined army. Towards the latter end of February, prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, having received intelligence that the count de Chabot was poſted with a conſiderable body of troops at Hoya, upon the Weſer, detached the hereditary prince of Brunſwick, with four battalions, and ſome light troops and dragoons, to diſlodge them from that neighbourhood. This enterprize was executed with the utmoſt intrepedity. The hereditary prince paſſed the Weſer at Bremen with part of his detachment, while the reſt advanced on this ſide of the river; and the enemy, being attacked in front and rear, were in a little time forced, and thrown into confuſion The bridge being abandoned, and near 700 men taken come, and our houſe in particular? Is it the intereſt of the two kings, the cauſe of your country, and my cauſe that you pretend to ſupport?—I repeat it, brother, that this deſign could not have been framed by you. I again command my ſon to purſue his journey; and I cannot conceive you will give the leaſt obſtruction: if you ſhould (which I pray God avert) I ſolemnly declare that I will not be conſtrained by ſuch meaſures, nor ſhall I ever forget what I owe to myſelf. As to my troops, you may ſee what I have written on that head to the Hanoverian miniſtry. The duke of Cumberland, by the convention of Cloſter-Seven, diſmiſſed them, and ſent them home: the ſaid miniſtry gave me notice of this convention, as a treaty by which I was bound. The march of the troops was ſettled; and an incident happening, they halted: that obſtacle being removed, they were to have continued their march. The court of Hanover will be no longer bound by the convention, while I not only accepted it on their word, but have alſo, in conformity with their inſtructions, negociated at Verſailles, and at Vienna. After all theſe ſteps they would have me contradict myſelf, break my word, and entirely ruin my eſtate, as well as my honour. Did you ever know your brother guilty of ſuch things? True it is, I have, as you ſay, ſacrificed my all; or rather, I have been ſacrificed. The only thing left me is my honour; and in the unhappy contraſt of our ſituations, I lament both you and myſelf, that it ſhould be from you, my dear brother, I ſhould receive the cruel advice to give up my honour. I cannot liſten to it; I cannot recede from my promiſe. My troops, therefore, muſt return home, agreeable to what the duke of Cumberland and the Hanoverian miniſtry ſtipulated with regard to me in the ſtrongeſt manner. I am afraid that the true circumſtances of things are concealed from you. Not to detain your expreſs too long, I ſhall ſend you, by the poſt, copies of all I have written to the Hanoverian miniſtry. I am grieve your honeſt heart to read it. I am, with a heart almoſt [illegible] full of tenderneſs for you, your, &c.

'Blanckenbourg, Nov. 27, 1757.'

priſoners, the count de Chabot threw himſelf, with two battalions into the caſtle, where he reſolved to ſupport himſelf, in hope of being relieved. The regiment of Bretagne, and ſome detachments of dragoons, were actually on the march to his aſſiſtance. The hereditary prince being made acquainted with this circumſtance, being alſo deſtitute of heavy artillery to beſiege the place in form, and taking it for granted he ſhould not be able to maintain the poſt after it might be taken, he liſtened to the terms of capitulation propoſed by the French general, whoſe garriſon was ſuffered to march out with the honours of war; but their cannon, ſtores, and ammunition were ſurrendered to the victors. This was the firſt exploit of the hereditary prince, whoſe valour and activity, on many ſubſequent occaſions, ſhone with diſtinguiſhed luſtre. He had no ſooner reduced Hoya, than he marched to the attac of Minden, which he inveſted on the 5th day of March, and on the 14th the garriſon ſurrendered at diſcretion. After the reduction of this city, the combined army advanced towards Hamelen, where the French general had eſtabliſhed his headquarters: but he abandoned them at the approach of the allies, and leaving behind all his ſic and wounded, with part of his magazines, retired without halting to Paderborn, and from thence to the Rhine, recalling in his march the troops that were in Embden, Caſſel, and the landgraviate of Heſſe, all which places were now evacuated. They were terribly harraſſed in their retreat by the Pruſſian huſſars, and a body of light-horſe, diſtinguiſhed by the name of Hanoverian hunters, who took a great number of priſoners, together with many baggage-waggons, and ſome artillery. Such was the precipitation of the enemy's retreat, that they could not find time to deſtroy all the magazines of proviſion and forage; and even forgot to call in the garriſon of Vechte, a ſmall fortreſs in the neighbourhood of Diepholt, who were made priſoners of war, and here was found a complete train of battering cannon and mortars. The count de Clermont, having reached the banks of the Rhine, diſtributed his forces in quarters of cantonment in Weſel and the adjoining country, while prince Ferdinand cantoned the allied army in the biſhopric of Munſter: here, however, he did not long remain inactive. In the latter end of May he ordered a detachment to paſs the Rhine at Duyſbourg, under the command of colonel Scheither, who executed his order without loſs, defeated three battalions of the enemy, and took five pieces of cannon. In the beginning of June the whole army paſſed the Rhine, on a bridge conſtructed for the occaſion, defeated a body of French cavalry, and obtained divers other advantages in their march towards Weſel. Kaiſerſworth was ſurprized, the greater part of the garriſon either killed or taken; and prince Ferdinand began to make preparations for the ſiege of Duſſeldorp. In the mean time, the count de Clermont, being unable to ſtop the rapidity of his progreſs, was obliged to ſecure his troops with ſtrong entrenchments, until he ſhould be properly re-enforced.

The court of Verſailles, though equally mortified and confounded at the turn of their affairs in Germany, did not ſit tamely and behold this reverſe; but exerted their uſual ſpirit and expedition in retrieving the loſſes they had ſuſtained. They aſſembled a body of troops at Hanau, under the direction of the prince de Soubiſe, who, it was ſaid, had received orders to penetrate, by the way of Donawert, Ingoldſtadt, and Arnberg, into Bohemia. In the mean time, re-enforcements daily arrived in the camp of the count de Clermont; and as repeated complaints had been made of the want of diſcipline and ſubordination in that army, meaſures were taken for reforming the troops by ſeverity and example. The mareſchal duke de Belleiſle, who now acted as ſecretary at war with uncommon ability, wrote a letter, directed to all the colonels of infantry, threatening them, in the king's name, with the loſs of their regiments, ſhould they connive any longer at the ſcandalous practice of buying commiſſions: an abuſe which had crept into the ſervice under various pretexts, to the diſcouragement of merit, the relaxation of diſcipline, and the total extinction of laudable emulation. The prince of Clermont having quitted his ſtrong camp at Rhinefeldt, retired to Nuys, a little higher up the river, and detached a conſiderable corps, under the command of the count de St. Germain, to take poſt at Crevelt, ſituated in a plain between his army and the camp of the allies, which fronted the town of Meurs: after ſeveral motions on both ſides, prince Ferdinand reſolved to attac the enemy, and forthwith made a diſpoſition for this purpoſe. He aſſigned the command of the whole left-wing, conſiſting of 18 battalions and 28 ſquadrons, to lieutenant-general Sporcken: the conduct of the right-wing, compoſed of 16 battalions and 14 ſquadrons, was entruſted to the hereditary prince and major-general Wangenheim; the ſquadrons, with the addition of two regiments of Pruſſian dragoons, were under the immediate direction of the prince of Holſtein, while the hereditary prince commanded the infantry. The light troops, conſiſting of five ſquadrons of huſſars, were divided between the prince of Holſtein and lieutenant-general Sporcken. Major Luckner's ſquadron, together with Scheither's corps, were ordered to obſerve the flank of the enemy's right, and with this view were poſted in the village of Papendeick; and a battalion of the troops of Wolfenbuttel were left in the town of Hulſte, to cover the rear of the army. Prince Ferdinand's deſign was to attac the enemy on their left flank; but the execution was rendered extremely difficult by the woods and ditches that embarraſſed the rout, and the numerous ditches that interſected this part of the country. On the 23d day of June, at four in the morning, the army began to move; the right advancing in two columns as far as St. Anthony, and the left marching up within half a league of Crevelt. The prince having viewed the poſition of the enemy from the ſteeple of St. Anthony, procured guides, and having received all the neceſſary hints of information, proceeded to the right, in order to charge the enemy's left flank by the villages or Worſt and Anrath; but, in order to divide their attention, and keep them in ſuſpence, with reſpect to the nature of his principal attac, he directed the generals Sporcken and Oberg to advance againſt them by the way of Crevelt and St. Anthony, and, in particular, to make the moſt of their artillery, that, being employed in three different places at once, they might be prevented from ſending any re-enforcement to the left, where the chief attac was intended. Theſe precautions being taken, prince Ferdinand, putting himſelf at the head of the grenadiers of the right-wing, continued his march in two columns to the village of Anrath, where he fell in with an advanced party of the French, which, after a few diſcharges of muſquetry, retired to their camp and gave the alarm. In the mean time, both armies were drawn up in order of battle; the troops of the allies in the plain between the villages of Anrath and Willich, oppoſite to the French forces, whoſe left was covered with a wood. The action began about one in the afternoon, with a ſevere cannonading on the part of prince Ferdinand, which, though well ſupported, proved ineffectual in drawing the enemy from their cover; he, therefore, determined to diſlodge them from the wood by dint of ſmall arms. The hereditary prince immediately advanced with the whole front, and a very obſtinate action enſued. Mean while, the cavalry on the right in vain attempted to penetrate the wood on the other ſide, where the enemy had raiſed two batteries, which were ſuſtained by 40 ſquadrons of horſe. After a terrible fire had been maintained on both ſides, till five in the afternoon, the grenadiers forced the entrenchments in the wood, which were lined by the French infantry. Theſe giving way abandoned the wood in the utmoſt diſorder; but the purſuit was checked by the conduct and reſolution of the enemy's cavalry, which, notwithſtanding a dreadful fire from the artillery of the allies, maintained their ground, and covered the foot in their retreat to Nuys.

The ſucceſs of the day was, in a good meaſure, owing to the artillery on the left and in the centre, with which the generals Sporcken and Oberg had done great execution, and employed the intention of the enemy on that ſide, while prince Ferdinand proſecuted his attac on the other quarter. It muſt be owned, however, that their right wing and centre retired in great order to Nuys, though the left was defeated, with the loſs of ſome ſtandards, colours, and pieces of cannon, and 6000 men killed, wounded, or taken priſoners °. This victory, however, which coſt the allies about 1500 men, was not at all deciſive in its conſequences; and, indeed, the plan ſeemed only calculated to diſplay the enterprizing genius of the Hanoverian general. True it is, the French army took refuge under the cannon of Cologn, where they remained, without hazarding any ſtep for the relief of Duſſeldorp, which prince Ferdinand immediately inveſted, and in a few days reduced, the garriſon being allowed to march out with the honours of war, on condition that they ſhould not, for the ſpace of one year, carry arms againſt the allies.

° Among the French officers who loſt their lives in this engagement, was the count de Giſors, only ſon of the mareſchal duke de Belleiſle, and laſt hope of that illuſtrious family, a young nobleman of extraordinary accompliſhments, who finiſhed a ſhort life of honour in the embrace of military glory, and fell gallantly fighting at the head of his own regiment, to the inexpreſſible grief of his aged father, and the univerſal regret of his country.

It was at this period that count de Clermont reſigned his command, which was conferred upon M. de Contades, and the French army was conſiderably re-enforced. He even threatened to attac prince Ferdinand in his turn, and made ſome motions with that deſign, but was prevented by the little river Erff, behind which the prince reſolved to lie quiet, until he ſhould be joined by the body of Britiſh troops under the command of the duke of Marlborough, the firſt diviſion of which had juſt landed at Embden. He flattered himſelf that the prince of Yſenbourg, at the head of the Heſſian troops, would find employment for the prince de Soubiſe, who had marched from Hanau, with a deſign to penetrate into the landgraviate of Heſſe-Caſſel: his vanguard had been already ſurpriſed and defeated by the militia of the country; and the prince of Yſenbourg was at the head of a conſiderable body of regular forces, aſſembled to oppoſe his further progreſs. Prince Ferdinand, therefore, hoped that the operations of the French general would be effectually impeded, until he himſelf, being joined by the Britiſh troops, ſhould be in a condition to paſs the Meuſe, transfer the ſeat of war into the enemy's country, thus make a diverſion from the Rhine, and perhaps oblige the prince de Soubiſe to come to the aſſiſtance of the principal French army, commanded by M. de Contades. He had formed a plan which would have anſwered theſe purpoſes effectually, and, in execution of it, marched to Ruremond on the Maeſe, when his meaſures were totally diſconcerted b a variety of incidents which he could not foreſee. The prince of Yſenbourg was, on the 23d day of July, defeated at Sangarſhauſen by the duke de Broglio, whom the prince de Soubiſe had detached againſt him with a number of troops greatly ſuperior to that which the Heſſian general commanded. The duke de Broglio, who commanded the corps that formed the vanguard of Soubiſe's army, having learned at Caſſel, that the Heſſian troops, under the prince of Yſenbourg, were retiring towards Munden, he advanced, on the 23d of July, with a body of 8000 men, to the village of Sangerſhauſen, where he found them drawn up in order of battle, and forthwith made a diſpoſition for the attac. At firſt his cavalry were repulſed by the Heſſian horſe, which charged the French infantry, and were broke in their turn. The Heſſians, though greatly inferior in number to the enemy, made a very obſtinate reſiſtance, by favour of a roc in the Fulde that covered their right, and a wood by which their left was ſecured. The diſpute was ſo obſtinate, that the enemy's left was obliged to give ground, but the duke de Broglio ordering a freſh corps to advance, changed the fortune of the day. The Heſſians, overpowered by numbers, gave way; part plunged into the river, where many periſhed, and part threw themſelves into the wood, through which they eſcaped from the purſuit of the Huſſars, who took above 200 ſoldiers and fifty officers, including the count de Canitz, who was ſecond in command. They likewiſe found on the field of battle ſeven pieces of cannon, and eight at Munden: but the carnage was pretty conſiderable, and nearly equal on both ſides. The number of the killed and wounded, on the ſide of the French, exceeded 2000; the loſs of the Heſſians was not ſo great. The prince of Yſenbourg having collected the remains of his little army, took poſt at Eimbeck, where he ſoon was reenforced, and found himſelf at the head of 12,000 men: but, in conſequence of this advantage, the enemy became maſters of the Weſer, and opened to themſelves a free paſſage into Weſtphalia.

The progreſs of prince Ferdinand upon the Maeſe had been retarded by a long ſucceſſion of heavy rains, which broke up the roads, and rendered the country impaſſable; and now the certain imformation of this unlucky chec left him no alternative but a battle or a retreat acroſs the Rhine: the firſt was carefully avoided by the enemy; the latter reſolution, therefore, he found himſelf under a neceſſity to embrace. In his preſent poſition he was hampered by the French army on one wing, on the other by the fortreſs of Gueldres, the garriſon of which had been lately re-enforced, as well as by divers other poſts, capable of obſtructing the convoys and ſubſiſtence of the combined army beſides, he had reaſon to apprehend that the prince de Soubiſe would endeavour to intercept the Britiſh troops in their march from Embden. Induced by theſe conſiderations, he determined to repaſs the Rhine, after having offered battle to the enemy and made ſeveral motions for that purpoſe. Finding them averſe to an engagement, he made his diſpoſitions for forcing the ſtrong paſs of Wachtendonck, an iſland ſurrounded by the Niers, of very difficult approach and ſituated exactly in his rout to the Rhine. This ſervice was performed by the hereditary prince of Brunſwick, who perceiving the enemy had drawn up the bridge, ruſhed into the water at the head of his grenadiers, who drove them away with their bayonets, and cleared the bridges for the paſſage of the army towards Rhinebergen. At this place prince Ferdinand received intelligence that M. de Chevert, reputed one of the beſt officers in the French ſervice, had paſſed the Lippe with fourteen battalions and ſeveral ſquadrons, to join the garriſon of Weſel, and fall upon lieutenant-general Imhoff, who commanded the detached corps of the combined army at Meer, that he might be at hand to guard the bridge which the prince had thrown over the Rhine at Rees. His ſerene highneſs was extremely deſirous of ſending ſuccours to general Imhoff; but the troops were too much fatigued to begin another march before morning; and the Rhine had overflowed its banks in ſuch a manner as to render the bridge at Rees impaſſable, ſo that M. Imhoff was left to the reſources of his own conduct and the bravery of his troops, conſiſting of ſix battalions and four ſquadrons, already weakened by the abſence of different detachments. This general having received advice on the fourth of Auguſt, that the enemy intended to paſs the Lippe the ſame evening with a conſiderable train of artillery, in order to burn the bridge at Rees, decamped with a view to cover this place, and join two battalions which had paſſed the Rhine in boats, under the command of general Zaſtrow, who re-enforced him accordingly; but the enemy not appearing, he concluded the imformation was falſe, and reſolved to reſume his advantageous poſt at Meer. Of this he had no ſooner repoſſeſſed himſelf than his advanced guards were engaged with the enemy, who marched to the attac from Weſel under the command of lieutenant-general de Chervert, conſiſting of the whole corps intended for the ſiege of Dueſſeldorp. Imhoff's front was covered by coppices and ditches, there being a riſing ground on his right, from whence he could plainly diſcern the whole force that advanced againſt him, together with the manner of their approach. Perceiving them engaged in that difficult ground, he poſted one regiment in a coppice with orders to fall upon the left flank of the enemy, which appeared quite uncovered; and as ſoon as their fire began, advanced with the reſt of his forces to attac them in front. The bayonet was uſed on this occaſion, and the charge given with ſuch impetuoſity and reſolution, that after a ſhort reſiſtance, the enemy fell in confuſion, and fled towards Weſel, leaving on the ſpot eleven pieces of cannon with a great number of waggons and other carriages; beſides the killed and wounded, who amounted to a pretty conſiderable number, the victor took three hundred and fifty-four priſoners, including eleven officers; whereas, on his part the victory was purchaſed at a very ſmall expence.

Immediately after this action, general Wangenheim paſſed the Rhine with ſeveral ſquadrons and battalions, to reenforce general Imhoff, and enable him to proſecute the advantage he had gained, while prince Ferdinand marched with the reſt of the army to Santen: from thence he proceeded to Rhineberg, where he intended to paſs; but the river had overflowed to ſuch a degree, that here, as well as at Rees, the ſhore was inacceſſible, ſo that he found it neceſſary to march farther down the river, and lay a bridge at Gtiethuyzen. The enemy had contrived four veſſels for the deſtruction of this bridge; but they were all taken before they could put the deſign in execution, and the whole army paſſed on the 10th day of Auguſt, without any loſs or further interruption. At the ſame time the prince withdrew his garriſon from Duſſeldorp, of which the French immediately took poſſeſſion. Immediately after his paſſage he received a letter from the duke of Marlborough, acquainting him that the Britiſh troops had arrived at Lingen, in their rout to Coesfeldt: to which place general Imhoff was ſent to receive them, with a ſtrong detachment. Notwithſtanding this junction, the two armies on the Rhine were ſo equally matched, that no ſtroke of importance was ſtruc on either ſide during the remaining part of the campaign. M. de Contades, ſeeing no proſpect of obtaining the leaſt advantage over prince Ferdinand, detached prince Xaverius of Saxony with a ſtrong re-enforcement to the prince de Soubiſe, who had taken poſſeſſion of Gottengen, and ſeemed determined to attac the prince of Yſenbourg at Eimbeck. That this officer might be able to give him a proper reception, prince Ferdinand, detached general Oberg with ten thouſand men to Lipſtadt, from whence, ſhould occaſion require, they might continue their march, and join the Heſſians. The whole body, when thus re-enforced, did not exceed 20,000 men, of whom general Oberg now aſſumed the command: whereas the troops of Soubiſe were increaſed to the number of 30,000. The allies had taken poſt upon the river Fulde at Sanderſhauſen, where they hoped the French would attac them; but the deſign of Soubiſe was firſt to diſlodge them from that advantageous ſituation. With this view, he made a motion, as if he had intended to turn the camp of the allies by the road of Munden. In order to prevent the execution of this ſuppoſed deſign, general Oberg decamped on the 10th of October, and, paſſing by the village of Landwernhagen, advanced towards Luttenberg, where, underſtanding the enemy were at his heels, he forthwith formed his troops in order of battle, his right to the Fulde, and his left extending to a thicket upon an eminence, where he planted five field-pieces. The cavalry ſupported the wings in a third line, the village of Luttenberg was in the rear, and four pieces of cannon were mounted on a riſing ground that flanked this village. The French having likewiſe paſſed Landwernhagen, poſted their left towards the Fulde, their right extending far beyond the left of the allies, and their front being ſtrengthened with above 30 pieces of cannon. At four in the afternoon the enemy began the battle with a ſevere cannonading, and at the ſame time the firſt line of their infantry attacked major general Zaſtrow, who was poſted on the left wing of the allies. This body of the French was repulſed; but in the ſame moment, a conſiderable line of cavalry advancing, charged the allies in front and flank. Theſe were ſupported by a freſh body of infantry with cannon, which, after a warm diſpute, obliged the confederates to give way; and general Oberg, in order to prevent a total defeat, made a diſpoſition for a retreat, which was performed in tolerable order; not but that he ſuffered greatly. in paſſing through a defile, from the fire of the enemy's cannon, which was brought up, and managed under the direction of the duke de Broglio. Having marched through Munden, by midnight, the retiring army lay till morning under arms in the little plain near Grupen, on the other ſide of the Weſer; but at day-break proſecuted their march, after having withdrawn the garriſon from Munden, until they arrived in the neighbourhood of Guntersheim, where they encamped. In this engagement general Oberg loſt about 1500 men, his artillery, baggage, and ammunition. He was obliged to abandon a magazine of hay and ſtraw at Munden, and leave part of his wounded men in that place to the humanity of the victor. But, after all, the French general reaped very little advantage from this victory.

By this time prince Ferdinand had retired into Weſtphalia, and fixed his head-quarters at Munſter, while M. Contades encamped near Ham upon the Lippe: ſo that, although he had obliged the French army to evacuate Hanover and Heſſe in the beginning of the year, when they were weakened by death and diſtemper, and even driven them beyond the Rhine, where they ſuſtained a defeat; yet they were ſoon put in a condition to baffle all his future endeavours, and penetrate again into Weſtphalia, where they eſtabliſhed their winter-quarters, extending themſelves in ſuch a manner as to command the whole courſe of the Rhine on both ſides, while the allies were diſpoſed in the landgraviate of Heſſe-Caſſel, and in the biſhopricks of Munſter, Paderborn, and Hildeſheim. The Britiſh troops had joined them ſo late in the ſeaſon, that they had no opportunity to ſignaliſe themſelves in the field; yet the fatigues of the campaign, which they had ſeverely felt, proved fatal to their commander, the duke of Marlborough, who died of a dyſentery at Munſter, univerſally lamented.

Having thus particulariſed the operations of the allied army ſince the commencement of the campaign, we ſhall now endeavour to trace the ſteps of the king of Pruſſia, from the period at which his army was aſſembled for action. Having collected his force as ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit, he undertook the ſiege of Schweidnitz in form on the 21ſt day of March; and carried on his operations with ſuch vigour, that in 13 days the garriſon ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, after having loſt one-half of their number in the defence of the place. While one part of his troops were engaged in this ſervice, he himſelf, at the head of another, advanced to the eaſtern frontier of Bohemia, and ſent a detachment as far as Trautenaw, garriſoned by a body of Auſtrians, who, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, abandoned the place, and retreated towards their grand army. By this ſucceſs he opened to himſelf a way into Bohemia, by which he poured in detachments of light troops, to raiſe contributions, and harraſs the out-poſts of the enemy. At the ſame time the baron de la Mothe Fouquet marched with another body againſt the Auſtrian general Jahnus, poſted in the county of Glatz, whom he obliged to abandon all the poſts he occupied in that country, and purſued as far as Nachod, within 20 miles of Koninſgratz, where the grand Auſtrian army was encamped under the command of mareſchal Daun, who had lately arrived from Vienna [p]. Over and above theſe excurſions, the king ordered a body of 30,000 men to be aſſembled, to act under the command of his brother prince Henry, an accompliſhed warrior, againſt the army of the empire, which the prince de Deuxponts, with great difficulty, made a ſhift to form again near Bamberg, in Franconia.

The king of Pruſſia, whoſe deſigns were perhaps even greater than he cared to own, reſolved to ſhift the theatre of the war, and penetrate into Moravia, a fertile country, which had been hitherto kept ſacred from ravage and contribution. Having formed an army of 50,000 choice troops, near Nieſs, in Sileſia, he divided them into three columns; the firſt commanded by mareſchal Keith, the ſecond by himſelf in perſon, and the third conducted by prince Maurice of Anhault of Deſſau. In the latter end of April they began their march towards Moravia; and general De la Ville, who commanded a body of troops in that country, retired as they advanced, after having thrown a ſtrong reenforcement into Olmutz, which the king was determined to beſiege. Had he paſſed by this fortreſs, which was ſtrongly fortified, and well provided for a vigorous defenſe, he might have advanced to the gates of Vienna, and reduced the emperor to the neceſſity of ſuing for peace on his own terms; but it ſeems he was unwilling to deviate ſo far from the common maxims of war as to leave a fortified place in the rear; and, therefore, he determined to make himſelf maſter of it before he ſhould proceed. For this purpoſe it was immediately inveſted: orders were iſſued to haſten up the heavy artillery, and mareſchal Keith was appointed to ſuperintend and direct the operations of the ſiege. Mean while, the Auſtrian commander, count Daun, being informed of his Pruſſian majeſty's motions and deſigns, quitted his camp at Leutomyſſel in Bohemia, and entered Moravia by the way of Billa. Being ſtill too weak to encounter the Pruſſians in the field, he extended his troops in the neighbourhood of the king's army, between Gewitz and Littau, in a mountainous ſituation, where he ran little or no riſk of being attacked. Here he remained for ſome time in quiet, with the fertile country of Bohemia in his rear, from whence he drew plentiful ſupplies, and received daily re-enforcements. His ſcheme was to relieve the beſieged occaſionally, to harraſs the beſiegers, and to intercept their convoys from Sileſia; and this ſcheme ſucceeded to his wiſh. Olmutz is ſo extenſive in its works, and ſo peculiarly ſituated on the river Morava, that it could not be completely inveſted without weakening the poſts of the beſieging army, by extending them to a prodigious circuit; ſo that, in ſome parts, they were eaſily forced by detachments in the nights, who fell upon them ſuddenly, and ſeldom failed to introduce into the place ſupplies of men, proviſions, and ammunition. The forage in the neighbourhood of the city having been previouſly deſtroyed, the Pruſſian horſe were obliged to make excurſions at a great diſtance, conſequently expoſed to fatigue, and liable to ſurpriſe; and, in a word, the Pruſſians were not very expert in the art of town taking.

Count Daun knew how to take advantage of theſe circumſtances, without hazarding a battle, to which the king provoked him in vain. While the garriſon made repeated ſallies to retard the operations of the beſiegers, the Auſtrian general harraſſed their foraging parties, fell upon different quarters of their army in the night, and kept them in continual alarm. Nevertheleſs, the king finiſhed his firſt parallel; and proceeded with ſuch vigour as ſeemed to promiſe a ſpeedy reduction of the place, when his deſign was entirely fruſtrated by an untoward incident. Mareſchal Daun, having received intelligence that a large convoy had ſet out from Sileſia for the Pruſſian camp, reſolved to ſeize this opportunity of compelling the king to deſiſt from his enterprize. He ſent general Jahnus, with a ſtrong body of troops, towards Bahrn, and another detachment to Stadtoliebe, with inſtructions to attac the convoy on different ſides; while he himſelf advanced towards the beſiegers, as if he intended to give them battle. The king of Pruſſia, far from being deceived by this feint, began, from the motions of the Auſtrian general, to ſuſpect his real ſcheme, and immediately diſpatched general Ziethen, with a ſtrong re-enforcement, to protect the convoy, which was eſcorted by eight battalions, and about 4000 men, who had been ſic, and were juſt recovered. Before this officer joined them, the convoy had been attacked on the 28th of June; but the aſſailants were repulſed with conſiderable loſs. Mareſchal Daun, however, took care that they ſhould be immediately re-enforced; and next day the attac was renewed with much greater effect. Four hundred waggons, guarded by four battalions, and about 1000 troopers, had juſt paſſed the defiles of Domſtadt, when the Auſtrians charged them furiouſly on every ſide: the communication between the head and the reſt of the convoy was cut off; and general Ziethen, after having exerted all his efforts for its preſervation, being obliged to abandon the waggons, retired to Troppau. Thus the whole convoy fell into the hands of the enemy, who took above 600 priſoners, together with general Putkammer; and the king of Pruſſia was obliged to relinquiſh his enterprize. This was a mortifying neceſſity to a prince of his high ſpirit, at a time when he ſaw himſelf on the eve of reducing the place, notwithſtanding the gallant defence which had been made by general Marſhal, the governor. Nothing now remained but to raiſe the ſiege, and retire without loſs in the face of a vigilant enemy, prepared to ſeize every opportunity of advantage: a taſk which, how hard ſoever it may appear, he performed with equal dexterity and ſucceſs. Inſtead of retiring into Sileſia, he reſolved to avert the war from his own dominions, and take the rout of Bohemia, the frontiers of which were left uncovered by mareſchal Daun's laſt motion, when he advanced his quarters to Poſnitz, in order to ſuccour Olmutz the more effectually.

[p] At this juncture the Pruſſian commandant of Dreſden being admitted into the Japan palace, to ſee the curious porcelaine with which it is adorned, perceived a door built up; and ordering the paſſage to be opened, entered a large apartment, where he found 3000 tents, and other field utenſils. Theſe had been concealed here when the Pruſſians firſt took poſſeſſion of the city: they were immediately ſeized by the commandant, and diſtributed among the troops of prince Henry's army.

After the king had taken his meaſures, he carefully concealed his deſign from the enemy, and, notwithſtanding the loſs of his convoy, proſecuted the operations of the ſiege with redoubled vigour, till the 1ſt day of July, when he decamped in the night, and began his march to Bohemia. He himſelf, with one diviſion, took the road to Konitz; and mareſchal Keith having brought away all the artillery, except four mortars, and one diſabled cannon, purſued his march by the way of Littau to Muglitz and Tribau. Although his Pruſſian majeſty had gained an entire march upon the Auſtrians, their light troops, commanded by the generals Buccow and Laudohn, did not fail to attend and harraſs his army in their retreat; but their endeavours were in a great meaſure fruſtrated by the conduct and circumſpection of the Pruſſian commanders. After the rear of the army had paſſed the defiles of Krenau, general Laſci, who was poſted at Gibau with a large body of Auſtrian troops occupied the village of Krenau with a detachment of grenadiers, who were ſoon diſlodged; and the Pruſſians purſued their march by Zwittau to Leutomyſſel, where they ſeized a magazine of meal and forage. In the mean time, general de Ratzow, who conducted the proviſions and artillery, found the hills of Hollitz poſſeſſed by the enemy, who cannonaded him as he advanced; but mareſchal Keith coming up, ordered him to be attacked in the rear, and they fled into a wood with precipitation, with the loſs of ſix officers and 300 men, who were taken priſoners. While the mareſchal was thus employed, the king proceeded from Leutomyſſel to Koningſgratz, where general Buccow, who had got the ſtart of him, was poſted with 7000 men behind the Elbe, and in the entrenchments which they had thrown up all round the city. The Pruſſian troops as they arrived paſſed over the little river Adler, and as the enemy had broken down the bridges over the Elbe, the king ordered them to be repaired with all expedition, being determined to attac the Auſtrian entrenchments: but general Buccow did not wait for his approach. He abandoned his entrenchments, and retired with his troops to Clumetz; ſo that the king took poſſeſſion of the moſt important poſt of Koningſgratz without further oppoſition. An Auſtrian corps having taken poſt between him and Hollitz, in order to obſtruct the march of the artillery, he advanced againſt them in perſon, and having driven them from the place, all his cannon, military ſtores, proviſion, with 1500 ſic and wounded men, arrived in ſafety at Koningſgratz, where the whole army encamped. His intention was to transfer the ſeat of war from Moravia to Bohemia, where he ſhould be able to maintain a more eaſy communication with his own dominions: but a more powerful motive ſoon obliged him to change his reſolution.

After the Ruſſian troops under Apraxin had retreated from Pomerania in the courſe of the preceding year, and the czarina ſeemed ready to change her ſyſtem, the courts of Vienna and Verſailles had, by dint of ſubſidies, promiſes, preſents, and intrigues, attached her, in all appearance more firmly than ever to the confederacy, and even induced her to augment the number of troops deſtined to act againſt the Pruſſian monarch. She not only ſigned her acceſſion in form to the quadruple alliance with the empreſs-queen and the kings of France and Sweden, but, in order to manifeſt her zeal to the common cauſe, ſhe diſgraced her chancellor, count Beſtuchef, who was ſuppoſed averſe to the war: ſhe divided her forces into ſeparate bodies, under the command of the generals Fermer and Browne, and ordered them to put their troops in motion in the middle of winter. Fermer accordingly began his march in the beginning of January, and on the 22d his light troops took poſſeſſion of Koningſberg, the capital of Pruſſia, without oppoſition; for the king's forces had quitted that country, in order to proſecute the war in the weſtern parts of Pomerania. They did not, however, maintain themſelves in this part of the country; but, after having ravaged ſome diſtricts, returned to the main body, which halted on the Viſtula, to the no ſmall diſturbance of the city of Dantzick. The reſident of the czarina actually demanded that the magiſtrates ſhould receive a Ruſſian garriſon; a demand which they not only peremptorily refuſed, but ordered all the citizens to arms, and took every other method to provide for their defence. At length, after ſome negotiations with general Fermer, the affair was compromiſed: he deſiſted from the demand, and part of his troops paſſed the Viſtula, ſeemingly to invade Pomerania, in the eaſtern part of which count Dohna had aſſembled an army of Pruſſians to oppoſe their progreſs. But after they had pillaged the open country, they rejoined their main body; and general Fermer, turning to the left, advanced towards Sileſia, in order to co-operate with the other Ruſſian army commanded by Browne, who had taken his rout through Poland, and already paſſed the Poſna. By the 1ſt of July, both bodies had reached the frontiers of Sileſia, and ſome of their coſſacks, penetrating into that province, had committed dreadful ravages, and overwhelmed the inhabitants with conſternation. Count Dohna, with the Pruſſian army under his command, had attended their motions, and even paſſed the Oder at Frankfort, as if he had intended to give them battle: but he was too much inferior in number to hazard ſuch a ſtep, which became an object of his ſovereign's own perſonal attention. Mareſchal Daun had followed the king into Bohemia, and, on the 22d day of July, encamped on the hills of Libiſchau, a ſituation almoſt inacceſſible, where he reſolved to remain, and watch the motions of the Pruſſian monarch, until ſome opportunity ſhould offer of acting to advantage. Nature ſeems to have expreſly formed this commander with talents to penetrate the deſigns, embarraſs the genius, and chec the impetuoſity of the Pruſſian monarch. He was juſtly compared to Fabius Maximus, diſtinguiſhed by the epithet of Cunctator. He poſſeſſed all the vigilance, caution, and ſagacity of that celebrated Roman. Like him, he hovered on the ſkirts of the enemy, harraſſing their parties, accuſtoming the ſoldiers to ſtrict diſcipline, hard ſervice, and the face of a formidable foe, and watching for opportunities which he knew how to ſeize with equal courage and celerity.

The king of Pruſſia, being induced by a concurrence of motives to ſtop the progreſs of the Ruſſians in Sileſia, made his diſpoſitions for retreating from Bohemia, and on the 25th day of July quitted the camp at Koningſgratz. He was attended in his march by 3000 Auſtrian light troops, who did not fail to incommode his rear: but notwithſtanding theſe impediments, he paſſed the Mittau, proceeded on his rout, and on the 9th day of Auguſt arrived at Landſhut. From thence he haſtened with a detachment towards Frankfort on the Oder, and joined the army commanded by lieutenant-general Dohna at Gorgas. Then the whole army paſſed the Oder by a bridge thrown over it at Gataviſe, and having reſted one day, advanced to Dertmitzel, were he encamped. The Ruſſians under general Fermer, were poſted on the other ſide of the little river Mitzel, their right extending to the village of Zwicker, and their left to Quertchem. The king being determined to hazard a battle, paſſed the Mitzel on the 25th in the morning, and turning the flank of the enemy, drew up his army in order of battle in the plain between the little river and the town of Zorndorf. The Ruſſians, by whom he was out-numbered, did not decline the diſpute; but as the ground did not permit them to extend themſelves, they appeared in four lines, forming a front on every ſide, defended by cannon and a chevaux-de-friſe, their right flank covered by the village of Zwicker. After a warm cannonade, the Pruſſian infantry were ordered to attac the village, and a body of grenadiers advanced to the aſſault; but this brigate unexpectedly giving way, occaſioned a conſiderable opening in the line, and left the whole left flank of the infantry uncovered. Before the enemy could take advantage of this incident, the interval was filled up by the cavalry under the command of general Seydlitz; and the king, with his uſual preſence of mind ſubſtituted another choice body of troops to carry on the attac. This began about noon, and continued for ſome time, during which both ſides fought with equal courage and perſeverance: at length general Sydlitz, having routed the Ruſſian cavalry, fell upon the flank of the infantry with great fury, which being alſo dreadfully annoyed by the Pruſſian artillery, they abandoned the village, together with their military cheſt, and great part of their baggage. Notwithſtanding this loſs, which had greatly diſordered their right wing, they continued to ſtand their ground, and terrible havoc was made among them, not only with the ſword and bayonet, but alſo by the cannon, which were loaded with crape-ſhot, and being excellently ſerved, did great execution. Towards evening the confuſion among them increaſed to ſuch a degree, that in all probability they would have been entirely routed, had they not been favoured by the approaching darkneſs, as well as by a particular operation which was very gallantly performed. One of the Ruſſian generals perceiving the fortune of the day turned againſt them, rallied a ſelect body of troops, and made a vigorous impreſſion on the right wing of the Pruſſians. This effort diverted their attention ſo ſtrongly to that quarter, that the right of the Ruſſians enjoyed a reſpite, during which they retired in tolerable order, and occupied a new poſt on the right, where the reſt of their forces were the more eaſily aſſembled. In this battle they are ſaid to have loſt above 15,000 men, 37 colours, five ſtandards, 12 mortars, the greater part of their baggage, and above 100 pieces of cannon. Among the priſoners that fell into the hands of the victor, were ſeveral general officers, and a good number loſt their lives on the field of battle. The victory coſt the king above 2000 men, including ſome officers of diſtinction, particularly two aides-du-camp, who attended his own perſon, which he expoſed without ſcruple to all the perils of the day. It would have redounded ſtill more to his glory, had he put a ſtop to the carnage; for after all reſiſtance was at an end, the wretched Ruſſians were hewn down without mercy. It muſt be owned, indeed, that the Pruſſian ſoldiers were in a peculiar manner exaſperated againſt this enemy, becauſe they had laid waſte the country, burned the villages, ruined the peaſants, and committed many horrid acts of barbarity, which the practice of war could not authoriſe [q]. The Pruſſian army paſſed the night under arms, and next morning the cannonade was renewed againſt the enemy, who, nevertheleſs, maintained that poſition, without flinching. On the 27th, they ſeemed determined to hazard another action, and even attac the conquerors: inſtead of advancing, however, they took the rout of Landſberg; but afterwards turned off towards Vietzel, and poſted themſelves between the rivers Warta and that village. Immediately after the battle, general Fermer[r], who had received a ſlight wound in the action, ſent a trumpet, with a letter to lieutenant-general Dohna, deſiring a ſuſpenſion of arms for two or three days to bury the dead, and take care of the wounded; and preſenting to his Pruſſian majeſty the humble requeſt of general Browne, who was much weakened with the loſs of blood, that he might have a paſſport, by virtue of which he could be removed to a place where he ſhould find ſuch accommodation as his ſituation required. In anſwer to this meſſage, count Dohna gave the Ruſſian general to underſtand, that as his Pruſſian majeſty remained maſter of the field, he would give the neceſſary orders for interring the dead, and taking care of the wounded on both ſides: he refuſed a ſuſpenſion of arms, but granted the requeſt of general Browne; and concluded his letter, by complaining of the outrages which the Ruſſian troops ſtill continued to commit, in pillaging and burning the king's villages.

The king of Pruſſia had no ſooner repulſed the enemy in one quarter than his preſence was required in another. When he quitted Bohemia, mareſchal Daun, at the head of the Auſtrian army, and the prince de Deuxponts, who commanded the forces of the empire, advanced to the Elbe, in order to ſurround the king's brother prince Henry, who, without immediate ſuccour, would not have been able to preſerve his footing in Saxony. The Pruſſian monarch, therefore, determined to ſupport him with all poſſible expedition. In a few days after the battle, he began his march from Cuſtrin with a re-enforcement of 24 battalions and [q] A detail of the cruelties committed by thoſe barbarians cannot be read without horror. They not only burned a great number of villages, but they raviſhed, rifled, murdered, and mutilated the inhabitants, without diſtinction of age or ſex, without any other provocation or incitement than brutal luſt and wantonneſs of barbarity. They even violated the ſepulchres of the dead, which have been held ſacred among the moſt ſavage nations. At Camin and Breckholtz they forced open the graves and ſepulchral vaults, and ſtripped the bodies of the generals Schlabendorf and Ruitz, which had been depoſited there. But the collected force of their vengeance was diſcharged againſt Cuſtrin, the capital of the New Marche of Bradenburgh, ſituated at the conflux of the Warta and the Oder, about 15 Engliſh miles from Frankfort. The particulars of the diſaſter that befel this city are pathetically related in the following extracts from a letter written by an inhabitant and eye-witneſs.

"On the 13th of Auguſt, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, a ſudden report was ſpread that a body of Ruſſian huſſars and coſſacks appeared in ſight of the little ſuburb. All the people were immediately in motion, and the whole city was filled with terror, eſpecially as we were certainly informed that the whole Ruſſian army was advancing from Meſerick and Konigſwalda, by the way of Landſberg. A re-enforcement was immediately ſent to our piquet-guard in the ſuburb, amounting, by this junction, to 300 men, who were ſoon attacked by the enemy, and the ſkirmiſh laſted from 4 till 7 o'clock in the evening. During this diſpute, we could plainly perceive, from our ramparts and church-ſteeple, ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, mounted on Engliſh horſes, reconnoitring our fortification through perſpective-glaſſes. They retired, however, when our cannon began to fire: then our piquet took poſſeſſion of their former poſt in the ſuburb; and the re-enforcement we had ſent from the city returned, after having broke down the bridge over the Oder. Next day count Dohna, who commanded the army near Frankfort, ſent in a re-enforcement of four battalions, ten ſquadrons, and a ſmall body of huſſars, under the command of lieutenant-general Scherlemmer. The huſſars and a body of dragoons were added to the piquet of the little ſuburb: the four battalions pitched their tents on the Anger, between the ſuburb and the fortification; and the reſt of the dragoons remained in the field, to cover the long ſuburb. General Scherlemmer, attended by our governor, colonel Schuck, went with a ſmall party to obſerve the enemy: but were obliged to retire, and were purſued by the coſſacks to the walls of the city. Between 4 and 5 o'clock next morning the poor inhabitants were rouſed from their ſleep by the noiſe of the cannon, intermingled with the diſmal ſhrieks and hideous yellings of the coſſacks belonging to the Ruſſian army. Alarmed at this horrid noiſe, I aſcended the church-ſteeple, from whence I beheld the whole plain, extending from the little ſuburb to the foreſt, covered with the enemy's troops, and our light-horſe, ſupported by the infantry, engaged in different places with their irregulars. At 8 I deſcried a body of the enemy's infantry, whoſe van conſiſted of 4 or 5000 men, advancing towards the vineyard, in the neighbourhood of which they had raiſed occaſional batteries in the preceding evening; from theſe they now played on our piquet-guard and huſſars, who were obliged to retire. They then fired, en ricochet, on the tents and baggage of the four battalions encamped on the Anger, who were alſo compelled to retreat. Having thus cleared the environs, they threw into the city ſuch a number of bombs and red-hot bullets, that by nine in the morning it was ſet on fire in three different places; and the ſtreets being narrow, burned with ſuch fury, that all our endeavours to extinguiſh it proved ineffectual. At this time the whole atmoſphere appeared like a ſhower of fiery rain and hail; and the miſerable inhabitants thought of nothing but ſaving their lives by running into the open fields. The whole place was filled with terror and conſternation and reſounded with the ſhrieks of women and children, who ran about in the utmoſt diſtraction, expoſed to the ſhot and the bomb-ſhells, which, burſting, tore in pieces every thing that ſtood in their way. As I led my wife, with a young child in her arms, and drove the reſt of my children and ſervants half naked before me, thoſe inſtruments of death and devaſtation fell about us like hail; but, by the mercy of God, we all eſcaped unhurt. Nothing could be more melancholy and affecting than a ſight of the wretched people, flying in crouds, and leaving their all behind, while they rent the ſky with their lamentations. Many women of diſtinction I ſaw without ſhoes and ſtockings, and almoſt without clothes, who had been rouſed from their beds, and ran out naked into the ſtreets. When my family had reached the open plain I endeavoured to return, and ſave ſome of my effects; but I could not force my way through a multitude of people, thronging out at the gate, ſome ſic, and bed-ridden perſons being carried on horſebac and in carriages, and others conveyed on the bacs of their friends, through a moſt dreadful ſcene of horror and deſolation. A great number of families from the open country, and defenceleſs towns in Pruſſia and Pomerania, had come hither for ſhelter with their moſt valuable effects, when the Ruſſians firſt entered the king's territories. Theſe, as well as the inhabitants, are all ruined; and many, who a few days ago poſſeſſed conſiderable wealth, are now induced to the utmoſt indigence. The neighbouring towns and villages were ſoon crouded with the people of Cuſtrin: the roads were filled with objects of miſery: and nothing was ſeen but nakedneſs and deſpair; nothing heard but the cries of hunger, fear, and diſtraction. For my own part, I ſtayed all night at Goltz, and then proceeded for Berlin. Cuſtrin is now a heap of ruins. The great magazine, the governor's houſe, the church, the palace, the ſtore and artillery houſes, in a word, the old and new towns, the ſuburbs, and all the bridges, were reduced to aſhes: nay, after the aſhes were deſtroyed, the piles and ſterlings were burned to the water's edge. The writings of all the colleges, together with the archives of the county, were totally conſumed, together with a prodigious magazine of corn and flour, valued at ſome millions of crowns. The cannon in the arſenal were all melted; and the loaded bombs and cartridges, with a large quantity of gunpowder, went off at once with a moſt horrible exploſion. A great number of the inhabitants are miſſing, ſuppoſed to have periſhed in the flames, or under the ruins of the houſes, or to have been ſuffocated in ſubterraneous vaults and caverns, to which they had fled for ſafety."

Nothing could be more inhuman, or contrary to the practice of a generous enemy, than ſuch vengeance wreaked upon the innocent inhabitants; for the Ruſſians did not begin to batter the fortifications until all the reſt of the place was deſtroyed. In the courſe of this campaign, the Ruſſian coſſacks are ſaid to have plundered and burned fourteen large towns and two hundred villages, and wantonly butchered above 2000 defenceleſs women and children. Such monſters of barbarity ought to be excluded from all the privileges of human nature, and hunted down as wild beaſts, without pity or ceſſation. What infamy ought thoſe powers to incur, who employ and encourage ſuch ruthleſs barbarians?

[r] General Fermer was of Scottiſh extract, and general Browne actually a native of North-Britain.

great part of his cavalry, and purſued his rout with ſuch unwearied diligence, that by the fifth day of September he reached Torgau, and on the 11th joined his brother. Mareſchal Daun had poſted himſelf at Stolpen, to the eaſtward of the Elbe, in order to preſerve an eaſy communication with the army of the empire encamped in the neigbourhood of Koningſtein, to favour the operations of general Laudohn, who had advanced through the lower Luſatia to the frontiers of Brandenburgh; to make a diverſion from the ſouthern parts of Sileſia, where a body of Auſtrian troops acted under the command of the generals Haarache and de Ville; and to interrupt the communication between prince Henry and the capital of Saxony. On the 5th of September, the garriſon in the ſtrong fortreſs of Koningſtein ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, after a very feeble reſiſtance, to the prince de Deuxponts, who forthwith took poſſeſſion of the ſtrong camp at Pirna. When the king of Pruſſia, therefore, arrived at Dreſden, he found the army of the empire in this poſition, and mareſchal Daun in a ſtill ſtronger ſituation at Stolpen, with bridges of communication thrown over the Elbe, ſo that he could not attac them with any proſpect of advantage. He had no other reſolution to take but that of endeavouring to cut them off from ſupplies of proviſion, and with this view he marched to Bautzen, which he occupied. This motion obliged the Auſtrian general to quit his camp at Stolpen, but he choſe another of equal ſtrength at Libau; yet he afterwards advanced to Rittlitz, that he might be at hand to ſeize the firſt favourable occaſion of executing the reſolution he had formed to attac the Pruſſians. The king having detached general Ratzow on his left, to take poſſeſſion of Weiſſenberg, marched forwards with the body of his army, and poſted himſelf in the neighbourhood of Hochkirchen, after having diſlodged the Auſtrians from that village. Matters were now brought to ſuch a delicate criſis, that a battle ſeemed inevitable, and equally deſired by both parties, as an event that would determine whether the Auſtrians ſhould be obliged to retreat for winter-quarters into Bohemia, or be enabled to maintain their ground in Saxony. In this ſituation mareſchal Daun reſolved to act offenſively, and formed a ſcheme for attacking the right flank of the Pruſſians by ſurpriſe. This meaſure was ſuggeſted to him by an overſight of the Pruſſians, who had neglected to occupy the heights that commanded the village of Hochkirchen, which was only guarded by a few free companies. He determined to take the advantage of a very dark night, and to employ the flower of his whole army on this important ſervice, well knowing, that ſhould they penetrate through the flank of the enemy, the whole Pruſſian army would be diſconcerted, and in all probability entirely ruined. Having taken his meaſures with wonderful ſecreſy and circumſpection, the troops began to move in the night between the 13th and 14th of October, favoured by a thic fog, which greatly encreaſed the darkneſs of the night. Their firſt care was to take poſſeſſion of the hill that commanded Hochkirchen, from whence they poured down upon the village, of which they took poſſeſſion, after having cut in pieces the free companies poſted there. The action began in this quarter about four in the morning, and continued ſeveral hours with great fury, for, notwithſtanding the impetuous efforts of the Auſtrian troops, and the confuſion occaſioned among the Pruſſians by the ſurprize, a vigorous ſtand was made by ſome general officers, who, with admirable expedition and preſence of mind, aſſembled and arranged the troops as they could take to their arms, and led them up to the attac without diſtinction of regiment, place, or precedence. While the action was obſtinately and deſperately maintained in this place, amidſt all the horrors of darkneſs, carnage, and confuſion, the king being alarmed, exerted all his perſonal activity, addreſs, and recollection, in drawing regularity from diſorder, arranging the different corps, altering poſitions, re-enforcing weak poſts, encouraging the ſoldiery, and oppoſing the efforts of the enemy; for although they made their chief impreſſion upon the right, by the village of Hochkirchen, mareſchal Daun, in order to divide the attention of the king, made another attac upon the left, which was with difficulty ſuſtained, and effectually prevented him from ſending re-enforcements to the right, where mareſchal Keith, under the greateſt diſadvantages, bore the brunt of the enemy's chief endeavours. Thus the battle raged till nine in the morning, when this gallant officer was ſhot through the heart. Prince Francis of Bruſwick had met with the ſame fate; prince Maurice of Anhalt was wounded and taken priſoner, and many others were either ſlain or diſabled. As the right-wing had been ſurprized, the tents continued ſtanding, and greatly embarraſſed them in their defence. The ſoldiers had never been properly drawn up in order; the enemy ſtill perſevered in their attac with ſucceſſive re-enforcements and redoubled reſolution; and a conſiderable ſlaughter was made by their artillery, which they had brought up to the heights of Hochkirchen. All theſe circumſtances concurring, could not fail to increaſe the confuſion and diſaſter of the Pruſſians; ſo that about ten the king was obliged to retire to Dobreſchutz, with the loſs of 7000 men, of all his tents, and part of his baggage. Nor had the Auſtrian general much cauſe to boaſt of his victory. His loſs of men was pretty near equal to that of the Pruſſian monarch: and, whatever reputation he might have acquired in foiling that enterprizing prince, certainly his deſign did not take effect in its full extent, for the Pruſſians were next day in a condition to hazard another engagement. The king of Pruſſia had ſuſtained no damage which he could not eaſily repair, except the death of mareſchal Keith, which was doubtleſs an irreparable misfortune[1].

His Pruſſian majeſty remained with his army ten days at Dobreſchutz, during which he endeavoured to bring the Auſtrians to a ſecond engagement, but count Daun declined the invitation, and kept his forces advantageouſly poſted on eminences planted with artillery. His aim having been fruſtrated at Hochkirchen, where he fought with many advantages on his ſide, he would not hazard another battle upon equal terms, with ſuch an enterprizing enemy, rendered more vigilant by the chec he had received, already re-enforced from the army of prince Henry, and eager for an opportunity to retrieve the laurel which had been ſnatched from him by the wiles of ſtratagem, rather than by the hand of valour. Count Daun having nothing more to hope from the active operations of his own army, contented himſelf with amuſing the Pruſſian monarch in Luſatia, while the Auſtrian generals, Harſche and de Ville, ſhould proſecute the reduction of Neiſs and Coſel, in Sileſia, which they now actually inveſted. As the Pruſſian monarch could not ſpare detachments to oppoſe every different corps of his enemies that acted againſt him in different parts of his dominions, he reſolved to make up in activity what he wanted in number, and if poſſible to raiſe the ſiege of Neiſs in perſon. With this view he decamped from Dobreſchutz, and in ſight of the enemy marched to Gorlitz without the leaſt interruption. From thence he proceeded towards Sileſia with his uſual expedition, notwithſtanding all the endeavours and activity of general Laudohn, who harraſſed the rear of the Pruſſians, and gained ſome petty advantages over them. Count Daun not only ſent this detached corps to retard them in their march, but at the ſame time, by another rout, detached a ſtrong reenforcement to the army of the beſiegers. In the mean time having received intelligence that the army of prince Henry in Saxony was conſiderably weakened, he himſelf marched thither, in hopes of expelling the prince from that country, and reducing the capital in the king's abſence. Indeed, his deſigns were ſtill more extenſive, for he propoſed to reduce Dreſden, Leipſick, and Torgau at the ſame time; the firſt with the main body under his own direction, the ſecond by the army of the empire under the prince de Duxponts, and the third by a corps under general Haddick, while the forces directed by Laudohn ſhould exclude the king from Luſatia. In execution of this plan he marched directly to the Elbe, which he paſſed at Pirna, and advanced to Dreſden, which he hoped would ſurrender without putting him to the trouble of a formal ſiege. The army of prince Henry had already retired to the weſtward of this capital, before the prince de Deuxponts, who had found means to cut off his communication with Leipſick, and even inveſted that city. During theſe tranſactions, general Haddick advanced againſt Torgau.

[1] As very little notice was taken, in the detail publiſhed by authority, of any part which this great man acted in the battle of Hochkirchen, and a report was induſtriouſly circulated in this kingdom, that he was ſurpriſed in his tent, naked, and half aſleep, we think it the duty of a candid hiſtorian to vindicate his memory and reputation from the foul aſperſion thrown by the perfidious and illiberal hand of envious malice, or elſe contrived to ſcreen ſome other character from the imputation of miſconduct. This taſk we are enabled to perform by a gentleman of candour and undoubted credit, who learned the following particulars at Berlin from a perſon that was eye-witneſs of the whole tranſaction. Field-mareſchal Keith, who arrived in the camp the very day that preceded the battle, diſapproved of the ſituation of the Pruſſian army, and remonſtrated to the king on that ſubject. In conſequence of his advice, a certain general was ſent with a detachment to take poſſeſſion of the heights that commanded the village of Hochkirchen; but by ſome fatality he miſcarried mareſchal Keith was not in any tent, but lodged with prince Francis of Brunſwick, in a houſe belonging to a Saxon major. When the firſt alarm was given in the night, he inſtantly mounted his horſe, aſſembled a body of the neareſt troops, and marched directly to the place that was attacked. The Auſtrians had taken poſſeſſion of the hill which the Pruſſian officer was ſent to occupy, and this they fortified with cannon: then they made themſelves maſters of the village in which the free companies of Anginelli had been poſted. Mareſchal Keith immediately conceived the deſign of the Auſtrian general, and knowing the importance of this place, thither directed all his efforts. He in perſon led on the troops to the attac of the village, from whence he drove the enemy; but being overpowered by numbers continually powering down from the hills, he was obliged to retire in his turn. He rallied his men, returned to the charge, and regained poſſeſſion of the place: being again repulſed by freſh re-enforcements of the enemy, he made another effort, entered the village a third time, and finding it untenable, ordered it to be ſet on fire. Thus he kept the Auſtrians at bay, and maintained a deſperate conflict againſt the flower of the Auſtrian army, from four in the morning till nine, when the Pruſſians were formed, and began to file off in their retreat. During the whole diſpute he rallied the troops in perſon, charged at their head, and expoſed his life in the hotteſt of a dreadful fire, like a private captain of grenadiers. He found it neceſſary to exert himſelf in this manner, the better to remove the bad effects of confuſion that prevailed, and in order to inſpirit the troops to their utmoſt exertion by his voice, preſence, and example. Even when dangerouſly wounded, at eight in the morning, he refuſed to quit the field; but continued to ſignalize himſelf in the midſt of the carnage until nine, when he received a ſecond ſhot in his breaſt, and fell ſpeechleſs into the arms of mr. Tibay, an Engliſh volunteer, who had attended him during the whole campaign. This gentleman, who was likewiſe wounded, applied to a Pruſſian officer for a file of men to remove the mareſchal, being uncertain whether he was entirely deprived of life. His requeſt was granted; but the ſoldiers, in advancing to the ſpot, were countermanded by another officer. He afterwards ſpoke on the ſame ſubject to one of the Pruſſian generals, a German prince, as he chanced to paſs on horſe-bac: when mr. Tibay told him the field-mareſchal was lying wounded on the field, he aſked if his wounds were mortal; and the other anſwering he was afraid they were, the prince ſhrugged up his ſhoulders, and rode off without further queſtion. The body of this great officer, being thus ſhamefully abandoned, was ſoon ſtripped by the Auſtrian ſtragglers, and lay expoſed and undiſtinguiſhed on the field of battle. In this ſituation it was perceived by count Laſci, ſon of the general of that name, with whom mareſchal Keith had ſerved in Ruſſia. This young count had been the mareſchal's pupil, and revered him as his military father, though employed in the Auſtrian ſervice. He recogniſed the body by the large ſcar of a dangerous wound, which general Keith had received in his thigh at the ſiege of Ockzakow, and could not help burſting into tears to ſee his honoured maſter thus extended at his feet, a naked, lifeleſs, and deſerted corpſe. He forthwith cauſed the body to be covered, and interred. It was afterwards taken up, and decently buried by the curate of Hochkirchen; and, finally, removed to Berlin by order of the king of Pruſſia, who beſtowed upon it thoſe funeral honours that were due to the dignified rank and tranſcendent merit of the deceaſed; merit ſo univerſally acknowledged, that even the Saxons lamented him as their beſt friend and patron, who protected them from violence and outrage, even while he acted a principal part in ſubjecting them to the dominion of his ſovereign.

The field-mareſchal count Daun appearing on the 6th day of November within ſight of Dreſden, at the head of 60,000 men, encamped next day at Lockowitz, and on the 8th his advanced troops attacked the Pruſſian huſſars and independent battalions, which were poſted at Strieſſen and Gruenewieſe. Count Schmettau, who commanded the garriſon, amounting to 10,000 men, apprehenſive that, in the courſe of ſkirmiſhing, the Auſtrian troops might enter the ſuburbs pellmell, poſted colonel Itzenplitz, with 700 men, in the redoubts that ſurrounded the ſuburbs, that in caſe of emergency they might ſupport the irregulars: at the ſame time, as the houſes that conſtituted the ſuburbs were generally ſo high as to overlook the ramparts, and command the city, he prepared combuſtibles and gave notice to the magiſtrates that they would be ſet on fire as ſoon as an Auſtrian ſhould appear within the place. This muſt have been a dreadful declaration to the inhabitants of theſe ſuburbs, which compoſe one of the moſt elegant towns in Europe. In theſe houſes, which were generally lofty and magnificent, the faſhionable and wealthy claſs of people reſided, and here a number of artiſts carried on a variety of curious manufactures. In vain the magiſtrates implored the mercy and forbearance of the Pruſſian governor, and repreſented, in the moſt ſubmiſſive ſtrain, that as they were unconcerned in the war, they hoped they ſhould be exempted from the horrors of devaſtation. In vain the royal family, who remained at Dreſden, conjured him to ſpare that laſt refuge of diſtreſſed royalty, and allow them at leaſt a ſecure reſidence, ſince they were deprived of every other comfort. He continued inflexible, or rather determined to execute the orders of his maſter, which indeed he could not diſobey with any regard to his own ſafety. On the 9th day of November, about noon, the Auſtrian vanguard attacked the advanced poſt of the garriſon, repelled the huſſars, drove the independent battalions into the ſuburbs, and forced three of the redoubts, while their cannon played upon the town. The governor expecting a vigorous attac next day, recalled his troops within the city, after they had ſet fire to the ſuburbs. At three in the morning the ſignal was made for this terrible conflagration, which in a little time reduced to aſhes the beautiful ſuburbs of Pirna, which had ſo lately flouriſhed as the ſeat of gaiety, pleaſure, and the ingenious arts. Every boſom warmed with benevolence muſt be affected at the recital of ſuch calamities. It excites not only our compaſſion for the unhappy ſufferers, but alſo our reſentment againſt the perpetrators of ſuch enormity. Next day mareſchal Daun ſent an officer to count Schmettau, with a meſſage, expreſſing his ſurpriſe at the deſtruction of the ſuburbs in a royal reſidence, an act of inhumanity unheard of among chriſtians. He deſired to know if it was by the governor's order this meaſure was taken, and aſſured him, that he ſhould be reſponſible, in his perſon, for whatever outrages had been or might be committed againſt a place in which a royal family reſided. Schmettau gave him to underſtand that he had orders to defend the town to the laſt extremity, and that the preſervation of what remained depended entirely on the conduct of his excellency; for, ſhould he think proper to attac the place, he (the governor) would defend himſelf from houſe to houſe, and from ſtreet to ſtreet, and even make his laſt effort in the royal palace, rather than abandon the city. He excuſed the deſtruction of the ſuburbs as a neceſſary meaſure, authoriſed by the practice of war; but he would have found it a difficult taſk to reconcile this ſtep to the laws of eternal juſtice, and far leſs to the dictates of common humanity. Indeed, if the ſcene had happened in an enemy's country, or if no other ſtep could have ſaved the lives and liberties of himſelf and his garriſon, ſuch a deſperate remedy might have ſtood excuſed by the law of nature and of nations: but on this occaſion he occupied a neutral city, over which he could exerciſe no other power and authority but that which he derived from illegal force and violence; nor was he at all reduced to the neceſſity of ſacrificing the place to his own ſafety, inaſmuch as he might have retired unmoleſted, by virtue of an honourable capitulation, which however he did not demand. Whether the peremptory order of a ſuperior will, in foro conſcientiæ, juſtify an officer who hath committed an illegal or inhuman action, is a queſtion that an Engliſh reader will ſcarce leave to the determination of a German caſuiſt with 150,000 armed men in his retinue. Be this as it will, mr. Ponickau, the Saxon miniſter, immediately after this tragedy was acted, without waiting for his maſter's orders, preſented a memorial to the diet of the empire, complaining of it as an action reſerved for the hiſtory of the war which the king of Pruſſia had kindled in Germany, to be tranſmitted to future ages. He affirmed, that, in execution of Schmettau's orders the ſoldiers had diſperſed themſelves in the ſtreets of the Pirna and Witchen ſuburbs, broke open the houſes and ſhops, ſet fire to the combuſtibles, added freſh fuel, and then ſhut the doors; that the violence of the flames was kept up by red-hot balls fired into the houſes, and along the ſtreets; that the wretched inhabitants, who forſook their burning houſes, were ſlain by the fire of the cannon and ſmall arms; that thoſe who endeavoured to ſave their perſons and effects were puſhed down and deſtroyed by the bayonets of the Pruſſian ſoldiers poſted in the ſtreets for that purpoſe: he enumerated particular inſtances of inhuman barbarity, and declared that a great number of people periſhed, either amidſt the flames, or under the ruins of the houſes. The deſtruction of 250 elegant houſes, and the total ruin of the inhabitants, were circumſtances in themſelves ſo deplorable, as to need no aggravation: but the account of the Saxon miniſter was ſhamefully exaggerated, and all the particular inſtances of cruelty falſe in every circumſtance. Baron Plotho, the miniſter of Brandenburgh, did not fail to anſwer every article of the Saxon memorial, and refute the particulars therein alledged, in a fair detail, authenticated by certificates under the hands of the magiſtrates, judges, and principal inhabitants of Dreſden. The moſt extraordinary part of this defence or vindication was the concluſion, in which the baron ſolemnly aſſured the diet, that the king of Pruſſia, from his great love to mankind, always felt the greateſt emotion of ſoul, and the moſt exquiſite concern, at the effuſion of blood, the devaſtation of cities and countries, and the horrors of war, by which ſo many thouſand fellow-creatures were overwhelmed; and that if his ſincere and honeſt inclination to procure peace to Germany, his dear country, had met with the leaſt regard, the preſent war, attended with ſuch bloodſhed and deſolation, would have beed prevented and avoided. He, therefore, declared that thoſe who excited the preſent troubles, who, inſtead of extinguiſhing, threw oil upon the flames, muſt anſwer to God for the ſeas of blood that had been, and would be ſhed, for the devaſtation of ſo many countries, and the entire ruin of ſo many innocent individuals. Such declarations coſt nothing to thoſe hardened politicians, who, feeling no eternal chec, are determined to ſacrifice every conſideration to the motives of rapacity and ambition. It would be happy, however, for mankind, were princes taught to believe that there is really an omnipotent and all judging power, that will exact a ſevere account of their conduct, and puniſh them for their guilt, without any reſpect to their perſons; that pillaging a whole people is more cruel than robbing a ſingle perſon; and that the maſſacre of thouſands is, at leaſt, as criminal as a private murder.

While count Daun was employed in making a fruitleſs attempt upon the capital of Saxony, the king of Pruſſia proceeded in his march to Neiſs, which was completely inveſted on the 3d day of October. The operations of the ſiege were carried on with great vigour by the Auſtrian general, de Harſche, and the place was as vigorouſly defended by the Pruſſian governor, Theſkau, till the firſt day of November, when the Pruſſian monarch approached, and obliged the beſiegers to abandon their enterprize. M. de Harſche having raiſed the ſiege, the king detached general Fouquet with a body of troops acroſs the river Neiſs, and immediately the blockade of Coſel was likewiſe abandoned. De Harſche retired to Bohemia, and de Ville hovered about Jagernſdorf. The fortreſs of Neiſs was no ſooner relieved than the king of Pruſſia began his march on his return to Saxony, where his immediate preſence was required. At the ſame time, the two bodies under the generals Dohna and Wedel penetrated by different routs into that country. The former had been left at Cuſtrin, to watch the motions of the Ruſſians, who had by this time retreated to the Viſtula, and even croſſed that river at Thorn, and the other had, during the campaign, obſerved the Swedes, who had now entirely evacuatee the Pruſſian territories. ſo that Wedel was at liberty to co-operate with the king in Saxony. He accordingly marched to Torgau, the ſiege of which had been undertaken by the Auſtrian general, Haddick, who was repulſed by Wedel, and even purſued to the neighbourhood of Eulenbourg. Wedel, being afterwards joined by Dohna, drove him from thence with conſiderable loſs, and then raiſed the ſiege of Leipſick. Mean while, the king proſecuted his march towards the capital of Saxony, driving before him the body of Auſtrian troops, under Laudohn, who retreated to Zittau. On the 10th day of November count Daun retired from Dreſdren, and with the army of the empire fell bac towards Bohemia; and on the 20th the king arrived in that city, where he approved of the governor's conduct. The Ruſſian general foreſeeing that he ſhould not be able to maintain his ground during the winter in Pomerania, unleſs he could ſecure ſome ſea-port on the Baltick, by which he might be ſupplied with proviſions, detached general Palmbach, with 15,000 men, to beſiege the town of Colberg, an inconſiderable place, very meanly fortified. It was accordingly inveſted on the 3d day of October; but the beſiegers were ſo ill provided with proper implements, or ſo little acquainted with operations of this nature, that the garriſon, though feeble, maintained the place againſt all their attacs for 26 days; at the expiration of which they abandoned their enterprize, and cruelly ravaged the open country in their retreat. Thus, by the activity and valour of the Pruſſian monarch, his generals, and officers, ſix ſieges were raiſed almoſt at the ſame period, namely, thoſe of Colberg, Neiſs, Coſel, Torgau, Leipſick, and Dreſden.

The variety of fortune which the king of Pruſſia experienced in the courſe of this campaign was very remarkable; but the ſpirit of his conduct, and the rapidity of his motions, were altogether without example. In the former campaign we were dazzled with the luſtre of his victories; in this we admire his fortitude and ſkill in ſtemming the different torrents of adverſity, and riſing ſuperior to his evil fortune. One can hardly without aſtoniſhment recollect, that in the courſe of a few months he invaded Moravia, inveſted Olmutz, and was obliged to relinquiſh that deſign; that he marched through an enemy's country, in the face of a great army, which, though it harraſſed him in his retreat, could not, in a rout of an hundred miles, obtain any advantage over him; that, in ſpite of his diſaſter at Olmutz, and the difficulties of ſuch a march, he penetrated into Bohemia, drove the enemy from Koningſgratz, executed another dangerous and fatiguing march to the Oder, defeated a great army of Ruſſians, and returned by the way of Saxony, from whence he drove the Auſtrian and imperial armies; that after his defeat at Hochkirchen, where he loſt two of his beſt generals, and was obliged to leave his tents ſtanding, he baffled the vigilance and ſuperior number of the victorious army, ruſhed like a whirlwind to the relief of Silcſia, invaded by an Auſtrian army, which he compelled to retire with precipitation from that province; that, with the ſame rapidity of motion, he wheeled about to Saxony, and once more reſcued it from the hands of his adverſaries; that in one campaign he made twice the circuit of his dominions, relieved them all in their turns, and kept all his poſſeſſions entire againſt the united efforts of numerous armies, conducted by generals of conſumate ſkill and undaunted reſolution. His character would have been ſtill more complete, if his moderation had been equal to his courage; but in this particular we cannot applaud his conduct. Incenſed by the perſecuting ſpirit of his enemies, he wreaked his vengeance on thoſe who had done him no injury; and the cruelties which the Ruſſians had committed in his dominions were retaliated upon the unfortunate inhabitants of Saxony. In the latter end of September, the preſident of the Pruſſian military directory ſent a letter to the magiſtrates of Leipſick, requiring them in the king's name to pay a new contribution of 600,000 crowns, and to begin immediately with the payment of one-third part, on pain of military execution. In anſwer to this demand the magiſtrates repreſented that the city having been exhauſted by the enormous contributions already raiſed, was abſolutely incapable of furniſhing further ſupplies; that the trade was ſtagnated and ruined, and the inhabitants ſo impoveriſhed, that they could no longer pay the ordinary taxes. This remonſtrance made no impreſſion. At five in the morning the Pruſſian ſoldiers aſſembled, and were poſted in all the ſtreets, ſquares, market-places, cæmeteries, towers, and ſteeples; then the gates being ſhut, in order to exclude the populace of the ſuburbs from the city, the ſenators were brought into the town-hall, and accoſted by general Hauſs, who told them the king his maſter would have money; and if they refuſed to part with it the city ſhould be plundered. To this peremptory addreſs they replied to this effect: 'We have no more money—we have nothing left but life; and we recommend ourſelves to the king's mercy.' In conſequence of this declaration, diſpoſitions were made for giving up the city to be plundered. Cannon were planted in all the ſtreets, the inhabitants were ordered to remain within doors, and every houſe reſounded with diſmal cries and lamentations. The dreaded pillage, however, was converted into a regular exaction. A party of ſoldiers, commanded by a ſubaltern, went from houſe to houſe, ſignifying to every burgher that he ſhould produce all his ſpecie, on pain of immediate pillage and maſſacre; and every inhabitant delivered up his all without further heſitation. About ſix in the evening, the ſoldiers returned to their quarters; but the magiſtrates were detained in confinement, and all the citizens were overwhelmed with grief and conſternation. Happy Britain, who knoweſt ſuch grievances only by report! When the king of Pruſſia firſt entered Saxony, at the beginning of the war, he delared he had no deſign to make a conqueſt of that electorate, but only to keep it as a depoſitum for the ſecurity of his own dominions, until he could oblige his enemies to acquieſce in reaſonable terms of peace; but upon his laſt arrival at Dreſden he adopted a new reſolution. In the beginning of December the Pruſſian directory of war iſſued a decree to the deputies of the ſtates of the electorate, demanding a certain quantity of flour and forage, according to the convention formerly ſettled; at the ſame time ſignifying, that though the king of Pruſſia had hitherto treated the electorate as a country taken under his ſpecial protection, the face of affairs was now changed in ſuch a manner, that for the future he would conſider it in no other light than that of a conquered country. The Ruſſians had ſeiſed in Pruſſia all the eſtates and effects belonging to the king's officers: a retaliation was now made upon the effects of the Saxon officers who ſerved in the Ruſſian army. Seals were put on all the cabinets containing papers belonging to the privy-counſellors of his Poliſh majeſty, and they themſelves ordered to depart for Warſaw at a very ſhort warning. Though the city had been impoveriſhed by former exactions, and very lately ſubjected to military execution, the king of Pruſſia demanded freſh contributions, and even extorted them by dint of ſeverities that ſhoc humanity. He ſurrounded the exchange with ſoldiers, and confining the merchants to ſtraw-beds and naked apartments, obliged them to draw bills for very large ſums on their foreign correſpondents: a method of proceeding much more ſuitable to the deſpotiſm of a Perſian ſophi towards a conquered people who profeſſed a different faith, than reconcileable to the character of a proteſtant prince towards a peaceable nation of brethren, with whom he was connected by the common ties of neighbourhood and religion. Even if they had acted as declared enemies, and been ſubdued with arms in their hands, the exceſſes of war on the ſide of the conqueror ought to have ceaſed with the hoſtilities of the conquered, who, by ſubmitting to his ſway, would have become his ſubjects, and in that capacity had a claim to his protection. To retaliate upon the Saxons, who had eſpouſed no quarrel, the barbarities committed by the Ruſſians, with whom he was actually at war, and to treat as a conquered province a neutral country, which his enemies had entered by violence, and been obliged to evacuate by force of arms, was a ſpecies of conduct founded on pretences which overturn all right, and confound all reaſon.

Having recorded all the tranſactions of the campaign, except thoſe in which the Swedes were concerned, it now remains that we ſhould particulariſe the progreſs which was made in Pomerania by the troops of that nation, under the command of count Hamilton. We have already obſerved, that in the beginning of the year the Pruſſian general, Lehwald, had compelled them to evacuate the whole province, except Stralſund, which was likewiſe inveſted. This, in all probability, would have been beſieged in form, had not Lehwald reſigned the command of the Pruſſians, on account of his great age and infirmities, and his ſucceſſor count Dohna been obliged to withdraw his troops, in order to oppoſe the Ruſſian army on the other ſide of Pomerania. The blockade of Stralſund being conſequently raiſed, and that part of the country entirely evacuated by the Pruſſians, the Swediſh troops advanced again from the iſle of Rugen, to which they had retired: but the ſupplies and re-enforcements they expected from Stockholm were delayed in ſuch a manner, either from a deficiency in the ſubſidies promiſed from France, or from the management of thoſe who were averſe to the war, that great part of the ſeaſon was elapſed before they undertook any important enterprize. Indeed, while they lay encamped under the cannon of Sralſund, waiting for theſe ſupplies, their operations were retarded by the exploſion of a whole ſhip-load of gunpowder intended for their uſe; an event imputed to the practices of the Pruſſian party in Sweden, which at this period ſeemed to gain ground, and even threatened a change in the miniſtry. At length the re-enforcement arrived about the latter end of June, and their general ſeemed determined to act with vigour. In the beginning of July, his army being put in motion, he ſent a detachment to diſlodge the few Pruſſian troops that were left at Anclam, Demmin, and other places, to guard that frontier; and they retreated accordingly. Count Hamilton having nothing further to oppoſe him in the field, in a very little time recovered all Swediſh Pomerania, and even made hot incurſions into the Pruſſian territories. Mean while, a combined fleet of 33 Ruſſian and ſeven Swediſh ſhips of war appeared in the Baltick, and anchored between the iſlands Dragoe and Amagh; but they neither landed troops nor committed hoſtilities. The Swediſh general advanced to Fehrbellin, ſent out parties that raiſed contributions within 25 miles of Berlin, and threw the inhabitants of that capital into the utmoſt conſternation. The king of Pruſſia, alarmed at their progreſs, diſpatched general Wedel from Dreſden, with a body of troops that were augmented on their march; ſo that, on the 20th of September, he found himſelf at Berlin with 11,000 effective men, at the head of whom he proceeded againſt count Hamilton, while the prince of Bevern, with 5000, advanced on the other ſide from Stetin. At their approach, the Swediſh commander retired, after having left a garriſon of 1400 men at Fehrbellin, in order to retard the Pruſſians, and ſecure the retreat of his army. The place was immediately attacked by general Wedel; and though the Swedes diſputed the ground from houſe to houſe with uncommon obſtinacy, he at laſt drove them out of the town, with the loſs of one-half their number either killed or taken priſoners. The body of the Swediſh army, without hazarding any other action, immediately evacuated the Pruſſian territories, and returned to the neighbourhood of Stralſund, intending to take winter-quarters in the iſle of Rugen. Count Hamilton, either diſguſted at the reſtrictions he had been laid under, or finding himſelf unable to act in ſuch a manner as might redound to the advantage of his reputation, threw up his command, retired from the army, and reſigned all his other employments.

The king of Pruſſia was not only favoured by a conſiderable party in Sweden, but he had alſo raiſed a ſtrong intereſt in Poland, among ſuch Palatines as had always oppoſed the meaſures of the reigning family. Theſe were now re-enforced by many patriots, who dreaded the vicinity, and ſuſpected the deſigns of the Ruſſian army. The diet of the republic was opened on the 2d day of November; and, after warm bebates, M. Malachowſki was unanimouſly elected mareſchal: but no ſooner had the chambers of nuncios begun their deliberations than a number of voices were raiſed againſt the encroachments of the Ruſſian troops, who had taken up their reſidence in Poland; and heavy complaints were made of the damages ſuſtained from their cruelty and rapine. Great pains were taken to appeaſe theſe clamours; and many were prevailed to refer theſe grievances to the king in ſenate; but when this difficulty ſeemed almoſt ſurmounted, Padhorſki, the nuncio of Volhinia, ſtood up, and declared that he would not permit any other point to be diſcuſſed in the diet while the Ruſſians maintained the leaſt footing within the territories of the republic. Vain were all the attempts of the courtiers to perſuade and mollify this inflexible patriot, he ſolemnly proteſted againſt their proceedings, and haſtily withdrew; ſo that the mareſchal was obliged to diſſolve the aſſembly, and recourſe was had to a ſenatus conſilium, to concert proper meaſures to be taken in the preſent conjuncture. The king of Poland was, on this occaſion, likewiſe diſappointed in his views of providing for his ſon, prince Charles, in the duchy of Courland. He had been recommended by the court of Ruſſia, and even approved by the ſtates of that country; but two difficulties occurred. The ſtates declared they could not proceed to a new election during the life of their former duke, count Biron, who was ſtill alive, though a priſoner in Siberia, unleſs their duchy ſhould be declared vacant by the king and republic of Poland; and, according to the laws of that country, no prince could be elected, until he ſhould have declared himſelf of the Augſburgh confeſſion. His Poliſh majeſty, however, being determined to ſurmount all obſtacles to his ſon's intereſt, ordered count Malachowſki, high-chancellor of Poland, to deliver to prince Charles a diploma, by which the king granted permiſſion to the ſtates of Courland to elect that prince for their duke, and appointed the day for his election and inſtalment, which accordingly took place in the month of January, notwithſtanding the clamour of many Poliſh grandees, who perſiſted in affirming that the king had no power to grant ſuch permiſſion without the conſent of the diet. The viciſſitudes of the campaign had produced no revolutions in the ſeveral ſyſtems adopted by the different powers in Europe. The czarina, who in the month of June had ſignified her ſentiments and deſigns againſt the king of Pruſſia, in a declaration delivered to all the foreign miniſters at Peterſburgh, ſeemed now, more than ever, determined to act vigorouſly in behalf of the empreſs-queen of Hungary, and the unfortunate king of Poland, who ſtill reſided at Warſaw. The court of Vienna diſtributed among the imperial miniſters at the ſeveral courts of the empire copies of a reſcript, explaining the conduct of her generals ſince the beginning of the campaign, and concluding with expreſſions of ſelf-approbation to this effect: 'though the iſſue of the campaign be not as yet entirely ſatisfactory, and ſuch as might be deſired, the imperial court enjoys, at leaſt, the ſincere ſatisfaction of reflecting, that, according to the change of circumſtances, it inſtantly took the moſt vigorous reſolutions; that it was never deficient in any thing that might contribute to the good of the common cauſe, and is now employed in making preparations, from which the moſt happy conſequences may be expected.'

We have already hinted at a decree of the aulick council of the empire, publiſhed in the month of Auguſt, enjoining all directors of circles, all imperial towns, and the nobleſſe of the empire, to tranſmit to Vienna an exact liſt of all thoſe who had diſobeyed the avocatoria of the empire, and adhered to the rebellion raiſed by the elector of Brandenburgh; that their revenues might be ſequeſtered, and themſelves puniſhed in their honours, perſons, and effects. As the elector of Hanover was plainly pointed out, and, indeed, expreſly mentioned in this decree, the king of Great-Britain, by the hands of baron Gemmegen, his electorial miniſter, preſented a memorial to the diet of the empire in the month of November, enumerating the inſtances in which he had exerted himſelf, and even expoſed his life, for the preſervation and aggrandiſement of the houſe of Auſtria. In return for theſe important ſervices, he obſerved, that the empreſs-queen had refuſed him the aſſiſtance ſtipulated in treaties againſt an invaſion planned by France, whoſe hatred he had drawn upon himſelf by his friendſhip to that princeſs; and his imperial majeſty even denied him the dictatorial letters which he ſollicited: that the court of Vienna had ſigned a treaty with the crown of France, in which it was ſtipulated that the French troops ſhould paſs the Weſer, and invade the electorate of Hanover, where they were joined by the troops of the empreſs-queen, who ravaged his Britannick majeſty's dominions with greater cruelty than even the French had practiſed; and the ſame duke of Cumberland, who had been wounded at Dettingen in the defence of her imperial majeſty, was obliged to fight at Haſtenbeck againſt the troops of that very princeſs, in defence of his father's dominions; that ſhe ſent commiſſaries to Hanover, who ſhared with the crown of France the contributions extorted from that electorate; rejected all propoſals of peace, and diſmiſſed from her court the miniſter of Brunſwick-Lunenbourg: that his imperial majeſty, who had ſworn to protect the empire, and oppoſe the entrance of foreign troops deſtined to oppreſs any of the ſtates of Germany, afterwards required the king of England to withdraw his troops from the countries which they occupied, that a French army might again have free paſſage into his dominions: that the emperor had recalled theſe troops, releaſed them from their allegiance to their ſovereign, enjoined them to abandon their poſts, their colours, and the ſervice in which they were embarked, on pain of being puniſhed in body, honour, and eſtate; and that the king of England himſelf was threatened with the ban of the empire. He took notice, that, in quality of elector, he had been accuſed of refuſing to concur with the reſolutions of the diet taken in the preceding year, of entering into alliance with the king of Pruſſia, joining his troops to the armies of of that prince, employing auxiliaries belonging to the ſtates of the empire, ſending Engliſh forces into Germany, where they had taken poſſeſſion of Embden, and exacting contributions in different parts of Germany. In anſwer to theſe imputations, he alledged that he could not, conſiſtent with his own ſafety, or the dictates of common ſenſe, concur with a majority, in joining his troops which were immediately neceſſary for his own defence, to thoſe which, from the arbitrary views of the court of Vienna, were led againſt his friend and ally, the king of Pruſſia, by a prince who did not belong to the generality of the empire, and on whom the command had been conferred, without a previous concluſum of the Germanick body; that, with reſpect to his alliance with the king of Pruſſia, he had a right, when deſerted by his former allies, to ſeek aſſiſtance whereſoever it could be procured: and ſurely no juſt grounds of complaint could be offered againſt that which his Pruſſian majeſty lent, to deliver the electoral ſtates of Brunſwick, as well as thoſe of Brunſwick-Wolfenbuttel, Heſſe, and Buckebourg, from the oppreſſions of their common enemy. Poſterity, he ſaid, would hardly believe, that at a time when the troops of Auſtria, the Palatinate, and Wirtemberg, were engaged to invade the countries of the empire, other members of the Germanick body, who employed auxiliaries in their defence, ſhould be threatened with outlawry and ſequeſtration. He owned, that, in quality of king, he had ſent over Engliſh troops to Germany, and taken poſſeſſion of Embden; ſteps for which he was accountable to no power upon earth, although the conſtitutions of the empire permit the co-eſtates to make uſe of foreign troops, not indeed for the purpoſe of invaſion or conqueſt in Germany, but for their defence and preſervation. He alſo acknowledged that he had reſented the conduct, and chaſtiſed the injuſtice, of thoſe co-eſtates who had aſſiſted his enemies, and helped to ravage his dominions; inferring, that if the crown of France was free to pillage the eſtates of the duke of Brunſwick, and the langrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, becauſe they had ſupplied the king of England with auxiliaries; if the empreſs-queen had a right to appropriate to herſelf half of the contributions raiſed by the French king in theſe countries, ſurely his Britannick majeſty had an equal right to make thoſe feel the burden of the war who had favoured the unjuſt enterprizes of his enemies. He expreſſed his hope, that the diet, after having duely conſidered theſe circumſtances, would, by way of advice, propoſe to his Imperial majeſty that he ſhould annul his moſt inconſiſtent mandates, and not only take effectual meaſures to protect the electorate and its allies, but alſo give orders for commencing againſt the empreſs-queen, as arch-ducheſs of Auſtria, the elector Palatine, and the duke of Wirtemberg, ſuch proceedings as ſhe wanted to enforce againſt his Britannick majeſty, elector of Brunſwick-Lunenbourg. For this purpoſe the miniſter now requeſted their excellencies to aſk immediately the neceſſary inſtructions for their principals. The reſt of this long memorial contained a juſtification of his Britannick majeſty's conduct in deviating from the capitulation of Cloſter-Seven; with a refutation of the arguments adduced, and a retortion of reproaches levelled againſt the king of England, in the paper or manifeſto compoſed and publiſhed under the direction of the French miniſtry, and intituled, 'A parallel of the conduct of the king of France with that of the king of England, relative to the breach of the capitulation of Cloſter-Seven by the Hanoverians.' But to this invective a more circumſtantial anſwer was publiſhed: in which, among other curious particulars, the letter of expoſtulation, ſaid to have been written by the Pruſſian monarch to the king of Great-Britain after the defeat at Colin, is treated as an infamous piece of forgery, produced by ſome venal pen employed to impoſe upon the public. The author alſo, in his endeavours to demonſtrate his Britannick majeſty's averſion to a continental war, very juſtly obſerves, that 'none but ſuch as are unacquainted with the maritime force of England can believe, that, without a diverſion on the continent, to employ part of the enemy's force, ſhe is not in a condition to hope for ſucceſs, and maintain her ſuperiority at ſea.' England, therefore, had no intereſt to foment quarrels or wars in Europe; but, for the ſame reaſon, there was room to fear that France would embrace a different ſyſtem: accordingly ſhe took no pains to conceal her views, and her envoys declared publicly that a war upon the continent was inevitable; and that the king's dominions in Germany would be its principal object.' He afterwards, in the courſe of his argumentation, adds, 'that they muſt be very ignorant, indeed, who imagine that the forces of England are not able to reſiſt thoſe of France, unleſs the latter be hindered from turning all her efforts to the ſea. In caſe of a war upon the continent, the two powers muſt pay ſubſidies; only with this difference, that France can employ her own land-forces, and aſpire at conqueſts.' Such were the profeſſed ſentiments of the Britiſh miniſtry, founded upon eternal truth and demonſtration, and openly avowed, when the buſineſs was to prove that it was not the intereſt of Great-Britain to maintain a war upon the continent; but, afterwards, when this continental war was eagerly eſpouſed, foſtered, and cheriſhed by the blood and treaſure of the Engliſh nation, then the partiſans of that very miniſtry, which had thus declared that England, without any diverſion on the continent of Europe, was an over match for France by ſea, which may be termed the Britiſh element; then their partiſans, their champions, declaimers, and dependents, were taught to riſe in rebellion againſt their former doctrine, and, in defiance of common ſenſe and reflection, affirm that a diverſion in Germany was abſolutely neceſſary to the ſucceſsful iſſue of England's operations in Aſia, Africa, and America. Notwithſtanding all the facts and arguments aſſembled in this elaborate memorial, to expoſe the ingratitude of the empreſs-queen, and demonſtrate the oppreſſive meaſures adopted by the Imperial power, it remains to be proved, that the member of a community is not obliged to yield obedience to the reſolution taken, and the decrees publiſhed, by the majority of thoſe who compoſe this community; eſpecially when reenforced with the authority of the ſupreme magiſtrate, and not repugnant to the fundamental conſtitution on which that community was eſtabliſhed.

If the empreſs-queen was not gratified to the extent of her wiſhes in the fortune of the campaign, at leaſt her ſelf-importance was flattered in another point, which could not fail of being intereſting to a princeſs famed for a glowing zeal and inviolable attachment to the religion of Rome. In the month of Auguſt the pope conferred upon her the title apoſtolical queen of Hungary, conveyed by a brief, in which he extolled her piety, and launched out into retroſpective eulogiums of her predeceſſors, the princes of Hungary, who had been always accuſtomed to fight and overcome for the catholic faith under this holy banner. This compliment, however, ſhe did not derive from the regard of Proſper Lampertini, who exerciſed the papal ſway under the aſſumed name of Benedict XIV. That pontiff, univerſally eſteemed for his good ſenſe, moderation, and humanity, had breathed his laſt in the month of April, in the 82d year of his age; and in July was ſucceeded in the papacy by cardinal Charles Rezzonico, biſhop of Padua, by birth a Venetian. He was formerly auditor, of the Rota; afterwards promoted to the purple by pope Clement XII. at the nomination of the republic of Venice; was diſtinguiſhed by the title of St. Maria d'Ara Gœli, the principal convent of the Cordeliers, and nominated protector of the Pandours, or Illyrians. When he aſcended the papal chair, he aſſumed the name of Clement XIII. in gratitude to the laſt of that name, who was his benefactor. Though of a diſagreeable perſon, and even deformed in his body, he enjoyed good health, and a vigorous conſtitution. As an eccleſiaſtic, his life was exemplary; his morals were pure and unimpeached: in his character he is ſaid to have been learned, diligent, ſteady, devout, and in every reſpect worthy to ſucceed ſuch a predeceſſor as Benedict.

The king of Spain wiſely perſiſted in reaping the advantages of a neutrality notwithſtanding the intrigues of the French partiſans at the court of Madrid, who endeavoured to alarm his jealouſy by the conqueſts which the Engliſh had projected in America. The king of Sardinia ſagaciouſly kept aloof, reſolving, in imitation of his predeceſſors, to maintain his power on a reſpectable footing, and be ready to ſeize all opportunities to extend and promote the intereſt of his crown, and the advantage of his country. As for the king of Portugal he had prudently embraced the ſame ſyſtem of forbearance: but in the latter end of the ſeaſon his attention was engroſſed by a domeſtic incident of a very extraordinary nature. Whether he had, by particular inſtances of ſeverity, exaſperated the minds of certain individuals, and exerciſed his dominion in ſuch acts of arbitrary power as excited a general ſpirit of diſaffection among his nobility; or, laſtly, by the vigorous meaſures purſued againſt the encroaching jeſuits in Paraguay, and their correſpondents in Portugul, had incurred the reſentment of that ſociety, we ſhall not pretend to determine: perhaps all theſe motives concurred in giving birth to a conſpiracy againſt his life, which was actually executed at this juncture with the moſt deſperate reſolution. On the 3d day of September, the king, according to cuſtom, going out in a carriage to take the air, accompanied by one domeſtic, was, in the night, at a ſolitary place near Belem, attacked by three men on horſebac, armed with muſquetoons, one of whom fired his piece at the coachman without effect. The man, however terrified both on his own account and that of his ſovereign's, drove the mules at full ſpeed; a circumſtance which in ſome meaſure diſconcerted the other two conſpirators, who purſued him at full gallop, and having no leiſure to take aim, diſcharged their pieces at random through the bac of the carriage. The ſlugs with which they were loaded happened to paſs between the king's right arm and his breaſt, dilacerating the parts from the ſhoulder to the elbow, but without damaging the bone, or penetrating into the cavity of the body. Finding himſelf grievouſly wounded, and the blood flowing apace, he, with ſuch preſence of mind as cannot be ſufficiently admired, inſtead of proceeding to the palace, which was at ſome diſtance, ordered the coachman to return to Junqueria, where his principal ſurgeon reſided, and there his wounds were immediately dreſſed. By this reſolution, he not only prevented the irreparable miſchief that might have ariſen from an exceſſive effuſion of blood; but, without all doubt, ſaved his life from the hands of other aſſaſſins, poſted on the road to accompliſh the regicide, in caſe he ſhould eſcape alive from the firſt attac. This inſtance of the king's recollection was magnified into a miracle, on a ſuppoſition that it muſt have been the effect of divine inſpiration; and, indeed, among a people addicted to ſuperſtition, might well paſs for a favourable interpoſition of providence. The king, being thus diſabled in his right arm, iſſued a decree, inveſting the queen with the abſolute power of government. In the mean time, no perſon had acceſs to his preſence but herſelf, the firſt miniſter, the cardinal de Saldanha, the phyſicians, and ſurgeons. An embargo was immediately laid on all the ſhipping in the port of Liſbon. Rewards were publicly offered, together with the promiſe of pardon to the accomplices, for detecting any of the aſſaſſins; and ſuch other meaſures uſed, that in a little time the whole conſpiracy was diſcovered: a conſpiracy the more dangerous, as it appeared to have been formed by perſons of the firſt quality and influence. The duke de Aveiro, of the family of Maſcarenhas; the marquis de Tavora, who had been viceroy of Goa, and now actually enjoyed the commiſſion of general of the horſe; the count de Attougui, the marquis de Alloria, together with their wives, children, and whole families, were arreſted immediately after the aſſaſſination, as principals in the deſign; and many other accomplices, including ſome jeſuits, were apprehended in the ſequel. The further proceedings on this myſterious affair, with the fate of the conſpirators, will be particulariſed among the tranſactions of the following year. At preſent, it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that the king's wounds were attended with no bad conſequences; nor did the impriſonment of thoſe noblemen produce any diſturbance in the kingdom.

The domeſtic occurrences of France were tiſſued with a continuation of the diſputes between the parliaments and clergy, touching the bill Unigenitus. In vain the king had interpoſed his authority; firſt propoſing an accommodation; then commanding the parliament to forbear taking cognizance of a religious conteſt, which did not fall under their juriſdiction; and, thirdly, baniſhing their perſons, and abrogating their power. He afterwards found it neceſſary to the peace of his dominions to recall and re-inſtate thoſe venerable patriots; and being convinced of the intolerable inſolence and turbulent ſpirit of the archbiſhop of Paris, had exiled that prelate in his turn. He was no ſooner re-admitted to his function, than he reſumed his former conduct, touching the denial of the ſacraments to thoſe who refuſed to acknowledge the bull Unigenitus: he even acted with redoubled zeal; intrigued with the other prelates; caballed among the inferior clergy; and not only revived, but augmented, the troubles throughout the whole kingdom. Biſhops, curates, and monks preſumed to with-hold ſpiritual conſolations from perſons in extremity, and were puniſhed by the civil power. Other parliaments of the kingdom followed the example exhibited by that of Paris, in aſſerting their authority and privileges. The king commanded them to deſiſt, on pain of incurring his indignation; they remonſtrated, and perſevered; while the archbiſhop repeated his injunctions and cenſures, and continued to inflame the diſpute to ſuch a dangerous degree, that he was given to underſtand he ſhould be again obliged to quit the capital, if he did not proceed with more moderation. But the chief care of the French miniſtry was employed in regulating the finances, eſtabliſhing funds of credit for raiſing money to pay ſubſidies, and maintain the war in Europe and America. In the courſe of this year they had not only conſiderably reenforced their armies in Germany, but made ſurpriſing efforts to ſupply the colony of Canada with troops, artillery, ſtores, and ammunition, for its defence againſt the operations of the Britiſh forces, which greatly out-numbered the French upon the continent. The court of Verſailles practiſed every ſtratagem to elude the vigilance of the Engliſh cruiſers. The ſhips deſtined for America they detached, both ſingle and in convoys, ſometimes from the Mediterranean, ſometimes from their harbours in the channel. They aſſembled tranſports in one port, in order to withdraw the attention of their enemies from another, where their convoys lay ready for ſailing; and in boiſterous weather, when the Engliſh could no longer bloc up their harbours, their ſtore-ſhips came forth, and hazarded the voyage, for the relief of the American ſettlements. Thoſe that had the good fortune to arrive on the coaſt of that continent were obliged to have recourſe to different expedients for eſcaping the Britiſh ſquadrons ſtationed at Halifax, or cruiſing in the bay of St. Laurence. They either ventured to navigate the river before it was clear of the ice, ſo early in the ſpring, that the enemy had not yet quitted the harbour of Nova-Scotia; or they waited on the coaſt of Newfoundland for ſuch thic fogs as might ſcreen them from the notice of the Engliſh cruiſers, in ſailing up the gulf; or, laſtly, they penetrated through the Straits of Belleiſle, a dangerous paſſage, which, however, led them directly into the river St. Laurence, at a conſiderable diſtance above the ſtation of the Britiſh ſquadron. Though the French navy was by this time ſo reduced, that it could neither face the Engliſh at ſea, nor furniſh proper convoys for commerce, her miniſtry nevertheleſs attempted to alarm the ſubjects of Great-Britain with the project of an invaſion. Flat-bottomed boats were built, tranſports collected, large ſhips of the line equipped, and troops ordered to aſſemble on the coaſt for embarkation; but this was no more than a feint to arouſe the apprehenſion of the Engliſh, diſconcert the adminiſtration, prejudice the national credit, and deter the government from ſending forces to keep alive the war in Germany. A much more effectual method they took to diſtreſs the trade of England, by laying up their uſeleſs ſhips of war, and encouraging the equipment of ſtout privateers, which did conſiderable damage to the commerce of Great-Britain and Ireland, by cruiſing in the ſeas of Europe and America. Some of them lay cloſe in the harbours of the channel, fronting the coaſt of England, and darted out occaſionally on the trading ſhips of this nation, as they received intelligence from boats employed for that purpoſe. Some choſe their ſtation in the North-Seas, where a great number of captures were made on the coaſt of Scotland; others cruiſed in the chops of the channel, and even to the weſtward of Ireland; but the far greater number ſcoured the ſeas in the neighboured of the Leeward-Iſlands in the Weſt-Indies, where they took a prodigious number of Britiſh ſhips, ſailing to and from the ſugar-colonies, and conveyed them to their own ſettlements in Martinique, Gaudaloupe, or St. Domingo.

With reſpect to the war that raged in Germany, the king of Denmark wiſely purſued that courſe which happily preſerved him from being involved in thoſe troubles by which great part of Europe was agitated, and terminated in that point of national advantage which a king ought ever to have in view for the benefit of his people. By obſerving a ſcrupulous neutrality, he enhanced his importance among his neighbours: he ſaw himſelf courted by all the belligerent powers: he ſaved the blood and treaſure of his ſubjects: he received large ſubſidies, in conſideration of his forbearance; and enjoyed, unmoleſted, a much more conſiderable ſhare of commerce than he could expect to carry on, even in times of univerſal tranquillity. He could not perceive that the proteſtant religion had any thing to apprehend from the confederacy which was formed againſt the Pruſſian monarch; nor was he miſled into all the expence, the perils, and diſquiets of a ſanguinary war, by that ignis fatuus which hath ſeduced and impoveriſhed other opulent nations, under the ſpecious title of the balance of power in Germany. Howſoever he might be ſwayed by private inclination, he did not think it was a point of conſequence to his kingdom whether Pomerania was poſſeſſed by Sweden or Puſſia; whether the French army was driven bac beyond the Rhine, or penetrated once more into the electorate of Hanover, whether the empreſs-queen was ſtripped of her remaining poſſeſſions in Sileſia, or the king of Pruſſia circumſcribed within the original bound of his dominion. He took it for granted that France, for her own ſake, would prevent the ruin of that enterprizing monarch; and that the houſe of Auſtria would not be ſo impolitic, and blind to its own intereſt, as to permit the empreſs of Ruſſia to make and retain conqueſts in the empire; but, even if theſe powers ſhould be weak enough to ſacrifice all the maxims of ſound policy to caprice or reſentment, he did not think himſelf ſo deeply concerned in the event, as, for the diſtant proſpect of what might poſſibly happen, to plunge headlong into a war that muſt be attended with certain and immediate diſadvantages. True it is, he had no hereditary electorate in Germany that was threatened with invaſion; nor, if he had, is it to be ſuppoſed that a prince of his ſagacity and patriotiſm would have impoveriſhed his kingdom of Denmark, for the precarious defence of a diſtant territory. It was reſerved for another nation to adopt the pernicious abſurdity of waſting its blood and treaſure, exhauſting its revenues, loading its own bac with the moſt grievous impoſitions, incurring an enormous debt, big with bankruptcy and ruin; in a word, of expending above 150,0000l. ſterling in fruitleſs efforts to defend a diſtant country, the entire property of which was never valued at one-twentieth part of that ſum; a country with which it had no natural connexion, but a common alliance ariſing from accident. The king of Denmark, though himſelf a prince of the empire, and poſſeſſed of dominions in Germany, almoſt contiguous to the ſcenes of the preſent war, did not yet think himſelf ſo nearly concered in the iſſue, as to declare himſelf either principal or auxiliary in the quarrel; yet he took care to maintain his forces by ſea and land upon a reſpectable footing: and, by this conduct, he not only provided for the ſecurity of his own country, but overawed the belligerent powers, who conſidered him as a prince capable of making either ſcale preponderate, juſt as he might chooſe to trim the balance. Thus he preſerved his wealth, commerce, and conſequence undiminiſhed; and, inſtead of being harraſſed as a party, was honoured as an umpire.

The United Provinces, though as adverſe as his Daniſh majeſty to any participation in the war, did not, however, ſo ſcrupulouſly obſerve the neutrality they profeſſed: at leaſt, the traders of that republic, either from an inordinate thirſt of lucre, or a ſecret biaſs in favour of the enemies of Great-Britain, aſſiſted the French commerce with all the appearance of the moſt flagrant partiality. We have, in the beginning of this year's tranſactions, obſerved, that a great number of their ſhips were taken by the Engliſh cruiſers, and condemned as legal prizes, for having French property on board: that the Dutch merchants, exaſperated by their loſſes, exclaimed againſt the Engliſh as pirates and robbers, petitioned the States for redreſs in very high terms, and even loudly clamoured for a war againſt Great-Britain. The charge of violence and injuſtice which they brought againſt the Engliſh, for taking and confiſcating the ſhips that tranſported to Europe the produce of the French iſlands in the Weſt-Indies, they founded on the tenth article of the treaty of commerce between Great-Britain and the ſtates-general of the United Provinces, concluded in the year 1668, ſtipulating, "That whatever ſhall be found on board the ſhips of the ſubjects of the United Provinces, though the lading, or part thereof, may belong to the enemies of Great-Britain, ſhall be free and unmoleſted; except theſe be prohibited goods, which are to be ſerved in the manner preſcribed by the foregoing articles." From this article the Dutch merchants argued, that, if there be no prohibited goods on board, the Engliſh had no right to ſtop or moleſt any of their ſhips, or make the leaſt enquiry to whom the merchandiſe belonged, whence it was brought, or whither bound. This plea the Engliſh caſuiſts would by no means admit, for the following reaſons: A general and perpetual licence to carry on the whole trade of their enemy would be ſuch a glaring abſurdity, as no convention could authoriſe: common ſenſe has dictated, and Grotius declared, that no man can be ſuppoſed to have conſented to an abſurdity; therefore, the interpretation given by the Dutch to this article could not be ſuppoſed to be its true and genuine meaning; which, indeed, relates to nothing more than the common courſe of trade, as it was uſually carried on in time of peace. But, even ſhould this interpretation be accepted, the article, and the treaty itſelf would be ſuperſeded and annulled by a ſubſequent treaty, concluded between the two nations in the year 1675, and often confirmed ſince that period, ſtipulating, in a ſecret article, That neither of the contracting parties ſhould give, nor conſent that any of their ſubjects and inhabitants ſhould give, any aid, favour, or council, directly or indirectly, by land or ſea, or on the freſh waters; nor ſhould furniſh, or permit the ſubjects or inhabitants of their reſpective territories to furniſh, any ſhips, ſoldiers, ſeamen, victuals, monies, inſtruments of war, gunpowder, or any other neceſſaries for making war, to the enemies of either party, of any rank or condition ſoever. Now, the Dutch have infringed this article in many inſtances during the preſent war, both in Europe and America; and, as they have ſo openly contravened one treaty, the Engliſh are not obliged to obſerve any other. They, moreover, fofeited all right to the obſervance of the treaty in queſtion, by refuſing the ſuccours with which they were bound, in the moſt ſolemn manner, to furniſh the king of Great-Britain, in caſe any of his territories in Europe ſhould be attacked: for nothing could be more weak and frivolous than the allegation upon which this refuſal was founded; namely, that the hoſtilities in Europe were commenced by the Engliſh, when they ſeized and confiſcated the veſſels of France; and they, being the aggreſſors, had no right to inſiſt upon the ſuccours ſtipulated in a treaty which was purely defenſive. If this argument had any weight, the treaty itſelf can have no ſignification. The French, as in the preſent caſe, will always commence the war in America; and when their ſhips containing re-enforcements and ſtores for the maintenance of that war, ſhall be taken on the European ſeas, perhaps in conſequence of their being expoſed for that purpoſe, they will exclaim that the Engliſh were the aggreſſors in Europe, conſequently deprived of all benefit accruing from the defenſive treaty ſubſiſting between them and the ſtates-general of the United-Provinces. It being impoſſible for the Engliſh to terminate the war, while their enemies derive the ſinews of it from their commerce carried on in neutral bottoms, they are obliged to ſuppreſs ſuch colluſions, by that neceſſity which Grotius himſelf hath allowed to be a ſufficient excuſe for deviating from the letter of any treaty whatſoever. In time of peace no Dutch ſhips were permitted to carry the produce of any French ſugar-iſland, or even to trade in any of the French ports in America or the Weſt-Indies; conſequently, the treaty which they quote can never juſtify them in carrying on a commerce, which, as it did not exiſt, and was not foreſeen, could not poſſibly be guarded againſt when that convention was ratified. Grotius whoſe authority is held in ſuch veneration among the Dutch, has determined that every nation has a right to ſeize and confiſcate the goods of any neutral power, which ſhall attempt to carry them into any place which is blocked up by that nation, either by land or ſea. The French iſlands in the Weſt-Indies were ſo blocked up by the Engliſh cruiſers, that they could receive no relief from their own government, conſequently no neutral power could attempt to ſupply them without falling under this predicament[t]. It was for theſe reaſons that the king of [t] In the reign of king William, when the Engliſh and Dutch were engaged in a war againſt France, the northern powers of Sweden and Denmark attempted to carry on the French commerce, under the ſhade of neutrality; but the Dutch and Engliſh joined in ſeizing the veſſels that were thus employed. Complaints of theſe captures were made at London and the Hague, and the complaints were given to underſtand at both places, that they ſhould not be allowed to carry on any trade with France, but what was uſual in time of peace. In conſequence of this declaration, mr. Groning formed the deſign of writing a treatiſe on the freedom of navigation, and communicated the plan of his work to the celebrated Puffendorf, who ſignified his ſentiments in a letter, which is preſerved by the learned Barbeyrac, in his notes upon that author's treatiſe on the law of nature and nations.

England declared, by the mouth of mr. Yorke, his miniſter plenipotentiary at the Hague, in a conference held in the month of Auguſt with the deputies of the ſtates-general, that though he was ready to concur in every meaſure that ſhould be propoſed for giving ſatisfaction to their high-mightineſſes, with whom he had always ſtudied to live in the moſt perfect union, he was nevertheleſs determined not to ſuffer the trade of the French colonies in America to be carried on by the ſubjects of other powers, under the ſpecious pretext of neutrality: nor to permit words to be interpreted as a lincenſe to drive a trade with his enemies, which, though not particularly ſpecified in the articles of contraband, was nevertheleſs rendered ſuch in all reſpects, and in every ſenſe, by the nature of the circumſtances. It is not at all more ſurpriſing that the Dutch merchants ſhould complain, than that the Engliſh government ſhould perſiſt in confiſcating the ſhips that were found to contain the merchandize of their enemies. The individual traders of every merchantile nation will run conſiderable riſques in extending their particular commerce, even when they know it muſt be detrimental to the general intereſt of their country. In the war maintained by the confederates againſt Louis XIV. of France, the merchant ſhips of the Dutch carried on an uninterrupted trade to the French ports: and, notwithſtanding the repeated ſollicitations of England, the ſtates-general could never be prevailed upon to prohibit this commerce, which undoutedly enabled France to protract the war. The truth is, they gave the Britiſh miniſtry to underſtand, that unleſs they connived at this traffic, their ſubjects could not poſſibly defray their proportion of the expence at which the war was maintained. It is well known through all Europe, that the ſubjects of the United-Provinces reaped conſiderable advantage, not only from this branch of illicit trade, but alſo by providing for both armies in Flanders, and by the practiſe of ſtoc-jobbing in England; conſequently, it was not the intereſt, either of the ſtates-general, or the Engliſh general, between whom there was a very good underſtanding, to bring that war to a ſpeedy concluſion; nor, indeed, ought we to fix the imputation of partiality upon a whole nation, for the private conduct of individuals, influenced by motives of ſelf-intereſt, which co-operate with the ſame energy in Holland, and among the ſubjects of Great-Britain. In the courſe of the former war, ſuch a ſcandalous appetite for gain prevailed in different parts of the Britiſh dominions, that the French iſlands were actually ſupplied with proviſions, ſlaves, and lumber from Ireland and the Britiſh colonies in North-America; and Martinique, in particular, muſt have ſurrendered to the command of the Engliſh ſquadron, ſtationed in thoſe ſeas, had it not been thus ſupported by Engliſh ſubjects. Certain it is, the Dutch had ſome reaſon to complain that they were decoyed into this ſpecies of traffic by the article of a treaty, which, in their opinion, admitted of no limitation; and that the government of Great-Britain, without any previous warning, or explaining its ſentiments on this ſubject, ſwept the ſea at once of all their veſſels employed in this commerce, and condemned them, without mitigation, to the entire ruin of many thouſand families. Conſidering the intimate connexion of mutual intereſt ſubſiſting between Great-Britain and the ſtates of the United-Provinces, they ſeem to have had ſome right to an intimation of this nature, which, in all probability, would have induced them to reſign all proſpect of advantage from the proſecution of ſuch a traffic.

Beſides the univerſal clamour excited in Holland, and the famous memorial preſented to the ſtates-general, which we have already mentioned in another place, a deputation of merchants waited four times ſucceſſively on the princeſs regent, to explain their grievances, and demand her concurrence in augmenting the navy for the preſervation of their commerce. She promiſed to interpoſe her beſt offices with the court of Great-Britain; and theſe co-operating with repreſentations made by the ſtates-general, the Engliſh miniſter was empowered to open conferences at the Hague, in order to bring all matters in diſpute to an amicable accommodation. Theſe endeavours, however, proved ineffectual. The Britiſh cruiſers continued to take, and the Britiſh courts to condemn all Dutch veſſels containing the produce of the French ſugar iſlands. The merchants of Holland and Zealand renewed their complaints with redoubled clamour, and all the trading part of the nation, re-enforced by the whole party that oppoſed the houſe of Orange, cried aloud for an immediate augmentation of the marine, and repriſals upon the pirates of England. The princeſs, in order to avoid extremities, was obliged not only to employ all her perſonal influence with the ſtates-general, but alſo to play off one faction againſt another, in the way of remonſtrance and exclamation. As far bac as the month of June, ſhe preſented a memorial to the ſtates-general, reminding them, that in the beginning of the war between France and England, ſhe had adviſed an augmentation ſhould be made in their land-forces, to ſtrengthen the garriſons of the frontier towns, and cover the territories of the republic from invaſion. She gave them to underſtand, that the provinces of Gueldres and Overyſſel, intimidated by the proximity of two formidable armies, had reſolved to demand that the augmentation of their land-forces ſhould be taken into conſideration by the other provinces; and requeſted her to re-enforce their ſollicitations that this meaſure might immediately take place. This requeſt, ſhe ſaid, ſhe the more readily granted, as ſhe could not but be ſenſible of the imminent danger that threatened the republic, eſpecially ſince the Hanoverian army had paſſed the Rhine; and as it behoved the ſtate to put itſelf in a condition to hinder either army from retiring into the territories of the republic, if it ſhould be defeated; for, in that caſe, the conqueror being authoriſed to purſue his enemy wherever he can find him, would bring the war into the heart of their country. This repreſentation had no other effect than that of ſuſpending the meaſure which each party propoſed. The princeſs, in her anſwer to the fourth deputation of the merchants, declared that ſhe beheld the preſent ſtate of their trade with the moſt anxious concern; that its want of protection was not her fault, but that of the towns of Dort, Haerlem, Amſterdam, Torgau, Rotterdam, and the Bille, to whoſe conduct it was owing, that the forces of the ſtate, by ſea and land, were not now on a better footing. The deputies were afterwards referred to her miniſter, M. de la Larrey, to whom they repreſented, that the augmentation of the land-forces, and the equipment of a fleet, were matters as diſtinct from each other as light from darkneſs: that there was no preſſing motive for an augmentation of the army, whereas, innumerable reaſonable reaſons rendered the equipment of a fleet a matter of the moſt urgent neceſſity. In a few days after this repreſentation was made, the princeſs, in an aſſembly of the ſtates-general, requeſted their high-mightineſſes, that ſeeing their earneſt and repeated efforts to induce the provinces of Holland, Zealand, Frieſland, and Weſt-Frieſland, to acquieſce in the propoſed augmentation of forces by ſea and land had not hitherto met with ſucceſs, they would now conſider and deliberate upon ſome expedient for terminating this affair, and the ſooner the better, in order, on one hand, to ſatisfy the ſtrong and well-grounded inſtances made by the provinces of Gueldres, Utrecht, Overyſſel and Groningen; and, on the other, to comply with the ardent juſt deſires expreſſed by the commercial inhabitants of the country. She told them that the deputation which waited on her conſiſted of 40 merchants, a number that merited attention no leſs than the ſpeech they pronounced, of which a great number of printed copies were diſtributed through all parts of the country. Without making any particular remarks on the harangue, ſhe only obſerved, that the drift of it did not tend to facilitate the negotiation begun with Great-Britain, nor to induce the nation to prefer a convention to a rupture with that crown. From this circumſtance ſhe inferred it was more than time to finiſh the deliberations on the propoſal for augmenting the forces both by ſea and land; a meaſure, without which ſhe was convinced in her conſcience the ſtate was, and would always remain, expoſed to all ſorts of misfortune and danger, both now and hereafter.

In conſequence of this interpoſition, the ſtates-general that ſame day ſent a letter to the ſtates of Holland and Weſt-Frieſland, communicating the ſentiments of the princes regent, and inſiſting upon the neceſſity of complying with her propoſal of the double augmentation. They obſerved, that an augmentation of the land-forces, for the defence of the frontiers, was unavoidable, as well as an equipment by ſea for the ſecurity of commerce: that the ſtates of the provinces of Gueldres, Utrecht, Overyſſel, and Groningen joined with them in the ſame opinion; and accordingly had inſiſted, by divers letters and propoſitions, on thoſe two points ſo eſſential to the public intereſt. They repreſented the danger of delay, and the fatal effects of diſcord: they propoſed, that by a reciprocal indulgence one party ſhould comply with the ſentiments of the other, in order to avoid a ſchiſm and dangerous diviſion among the confederates, the conſequences of which would be very deplorable; while the republic, in the mean time, would remain in a defence-leſs condition, both by ſea and land, and depend upon the arbitrary power of its neighbours. They conjured them, therefore, as they valued the ſafety of their country, and all that was dear to them, as they regarded the protection of the good inhabitants, the concord and harmony which at all times, but eſpecially at the preſent critical juncture, was of the laſt neceſſity, that they would ſeriouſly reflect upon the exhortations of her royal highneſs, as well as on the repeated inſtances of the majority of the confederates; and take a wiſe and ſalutary reſolution with regard to the propoſed augmentation of the land-forces, ſo that this addition, together with an equipment at ſea, might, the ſooner the better, be unanimouſly brought to a concluſion. It was undoubtedly the duty of all who wiſhed well to their country to moderate the heat and precipitation of thoſe, who, provoked by their loſſes, and ſtimulated by reſentment, endeavoured at this period to involve their nation in a war with Great-Britain. Had matters been puſhed to this extremity, in a few months the republic would, in all probability, have been brought to the brink of ruin. The Dutch were diſtracted by internal diviſions; they were altogether unprovided for hoſtilities by ſea; the ocean was covered with their trading veſſels; and the naval armaments of Great-Britain were ſo numerous and powerful as to render all reſiſtance on that element equally vain and pernicious. The Engliſh could not only have ſcoured the ſeas, and made prize of their ſhipping, but were alſo in a condition to reduce or demoliſh all their towns in Zealand, where they would hardly have met with any oppoſition.

While the operations of the war were proſecuted through the four quarters of the globe, the iſland of Great-Britain, which may be termed the centre that gave motion to this vaſt machine, enjoyed all the tranquillity of the moſt profound peace, and ſaw nothing of war but the preparations and trophies, which ſerved only to animate the nation to a deſire of further conqueſt; for the dejection occaſioned by the misfortune at St. Cas ſoon vaniſhed before the proſpect of victory and ſucceſs. Conſidering the agitation naturally produced among the common people by the practice of preſſing men into the ſervice of the navy, which in the beginning of the year had been carried on with unuſual violence, the levy of ſo many new corps of ſoldiers, and the endeavours uſed in forming the national militia, very few diſturbances happened to interrupt the internal repoſe of the nation. From private acts of malice, fraud, violence, and rapine, no community whatſoever is exempted. In the month of April, the temporary wooden-bridge over the Thames, built for the conveniency of carriages and paſſengers, while the workmen ſhould be employed in widening and repairing London-bridge, was maliciouſly ſet on fire in the night, and continued burning till noon next day, when the ruins of it fell into the river. The deſtruction of this conveniency proved very detrimental to the commerce of the city, notwithſtanding the vigilancy and diſcretion of the magiſtrates, in applying remedies for this misfortune. A promiſe of the king's pardon was offered in a public advertiſement, by the ſecretary of ſtate, and a reward of 200l. by the city of London to any perſon who ſhould diſcover the perpetrator of ſuch wicked outrage; but nevertheleſs he eſcaped detection. No individual, nor any ſociety of men, could have the leaſt intereſt in the execution of ſuch a ſcheme, except the body of London watermen; but as no diſcovery was made to the prejudice of any perſon belonging to that ſociety, the deed was imputed to the malice of ſome ſecret enemy to the public. Even after a new temporary bridge was erected, another attempt was made (in all probability by the ſame incendiary) to reduce the whole to aſhes, but happily miſcarried, and a guard was appointed, to prevent any ſuch atrocious efforts in the ſequel. Dangerous tumults were raiſed in and about Mancheſter, by a prodigious number of manufacturers, who had left off working, and entered into a combination to raiſe, by force, the price of their labour. They had formed a regular plan, and collected large ſums for the maintenance of the poorer ſort, while they refuſed to work for their families. They inſulted and abuſed all thoſe who would not join in this defection; diſperſed inſendiary letters, and denounced terrible threats againſt all ſuch as ſhould preſume to oppoſe their proceedings. But theſe menaces had no effect upon the magiſtrates and juſtices, who did their duty with ſuch diſcretion and courage, that the ringleaders being ſingled out, and puniſhed by law, the reſt were ſoon reduced to order.

In the month of June Florence Henſy, an obſcure phyſician, and native of Ireland, who had been apprehended for treaſonable practices, was tried in the court of king's-bench on an indictment for high-treaſon. In the courſe of the trial it appeared that he had been employed as a ſpy for the French miniſtry: to which, in conſideration of a paltry penſion, he ſent intelligence of every material occurrence in Great-Britain. The correſpondence was managed by his brother, a jeſuit, who acted as chaplain and ſecretary to the Spaniſh embaſſador at the Hague. The Britiſh reſident at that court having learned from the Spaniſh miniſter ſome ſecrets relating to England, even before they were communicated to him from the Engliſh miniſtry, was induced to ſet on foot an enquiry touching the ſource of this information, and ſoon received an aſſurance, that the ſecretary of the Spaniſh embaſſador had a brother, a phyſician in London. The ſuſpicion naturally ariſing from this circumſtance being imparted to the miniſtry of England, Henſy was narrowly watched, and 29 of his letters were intercepted. From the contents of theſe he was convicted of having given the French court the firſt notice of the expedition to North-America, the capture of the two ſhips, the Alcide and Lys, the ſailing and deſtination of every ſquadron and armament, and the difficulties that occurred in raiſing money for the ſervice of the public. He had even informed them that the ſecret expedition of the foregoing year was intended againſt Rochefort, and adviſed a deſcent upon Great-Britain, at a certain time and place, as the moſt effectual method of diſtreſſing the government, and effecting the public credit. After a long trial he was found guilty of treaſon, and received the ſentence of death uſually pronounced on ſuch occaſions: but whether he earned forgiveneſs by ſome material diſcovery, or the miniſter found him ſo inſenſible and inſignificant that he was aſhamed to take his life, he eſcaped execution, and was pardoned, on condition of going into perpetual exile. The ſeverity of the government was much about the ſame period exerciſed on dr. Shebbeare, a public writer, who, in a ſeries of printed letters to the people of England, had animadverted on the conduct of the miniſtry in the moſt acrimonious terms, ſtigmatiſed ſome great names with all the virulence of cenſure, and even aſſaulted the throne itſelf with oblique inſinuation and ironical ſatire. The miniſtry, incenſed at the boldneſs, and ſtill more enraged at the ſucceſs of this author, whoſe writings were brought with avidity by the public, determined to puniſh him ſeverely for his arrogance and abuſe, and he was apprehended by a warrant from the ſecretary's office. His ſixth letter to the people of England was pitched upon as the foundation of a proſecution. After a ſhort trial in the court of king's-bench, he was found guilty of having written the ſixth letter to the people of England, adjudging a libellous pamphlet, ſentenced to ſtand in the pillory, to pay a ſmall fine, to be impriſoned three years, and give ſecurity for his future good behaviour: ſo that, in effect, this good man ſuffered more for having given vent to the unguarded effuſions of miſtaken zeal, couched in the language of paſſion and ſcurrility, than was inflicted upon Henſy, a convicted traitor, who had acted as a ſpy for France, and betrayed his own country for hire.

Amidſt a variety of crimes and diſorders, ariſing from impetuoſity of temper, unreined paſſion, luxury, extravagance, and an almoſt total want of police and ſubordination, the virtues of benevolence are always ſpringing up to an extraordinary growth in the Britiſh ſoil; and here charities are often eſtabliſhed by the humanity of individuals, which in any other country would be honoured as national inſtitutions: witneſs the great number of hoſpitals and infirmaries in London and Weſtminſter, erected and maintained by voluntary contributions, or raiſed by the princely donations of private founders. In the courſe of this year the public began to enjoy the benefit of ſeveral admirable inſtitutions. Mr Henry Raine, a private gentleman of Middleſex, had, in his life-time, built and endowed an hoſpital for the maintenance of 40 poor maidens. By his will he bequeathed a certain ſum of money to accumulate at intereſt, under the management of truſtees, until the yearly produce ſhould amount to 210l. to be given in marriage-portions to two of his maidens educated in his hoſpital, at the age of 22, who ſhould be the beſt recommended for piety and induſtry by the maſters or miſtreſſes whom they had ſerved. In the month of March, the ſum deſtined for this laudable purpoſe was completed; when the truſtees, by public advertiſement, ſummoned the maidens educated in the hoſpital to appear on a certain day, with proper certificates of their behaviour and circumſtances, that ſix of the moſt deſerving might be ſelected to draw lots for the prize of 100l. to be paid as her marriage portion, provided ſhe married a man of an unblemiſhed character, a member of the church of England, reſiding within certain ſpecified pariſhes, and approved by the truſtees. Accordingly, on the first of May the candidates appeared, and the prize being gained by one young woman, in presence of a numerous assembly of all ranks, attracted by curiosity, the other five maidens, with a sixth, added in lieu of her who had been successful, were marked for a second chance on the same day of the following year, when a second prize of the same value would be presented: thus a new candidate will be added every year, that every maiden who has been educated in this hospital, and preserved her character without reproach, may have a chance for the noble donation, which is also accompanied with the sum of 5l. to defray the expence of the wedding entertainment. One scarce knows whether most to admire the plan, or commend the humanity of this excellent institution. Of equal and perhaps superior merit was another charitable establishment, which also took effect about this period. A small number of humane individuals, chiefly citizens of London, deeply affected with the situation of common prostitutes, who are certainly the most forlorn of all human creatures, formed a generous resolution in their favour, such as even the best men of the kingdom had never before the courage to avow. They considered that many of these unhappy creatures, so wretched in themselves, and so productive of mischief to society, had been seduced to vice in their tender years by the perfidious artifice of the other sex, or the violence of unruly passion, before they had acquired experience to guard against the one, or foresight to perceive the fatal consequences of the other: that the jewel, reputation, being thus irretrievably lost, perhaps in one unguarded moment, they were covered with shame and disgrace, abandoned by their families, excluded from all pity, regard, and assistance: that, stung by self-conviction, insulted with reproach, denied the privilege of penitence and contrition, cut off from all hope, impelled by indigence, and maddened with despair, they had plunged into a life of infamy, in which they were exposed to deplorable vicissitudes of misery, and the most excruciating pangs of reflection that any human being could sustain: that, whatever remorse they might feel, howsoever they might detest their own vice, or long for an opportunity of amendment, they were entirely destitute of all means of reformation: they were not only deprived of all possibility of profiting by those precious moments of repentance, and becoming again useful members of society; but, in order to earn a miserable subsistence, were obliged to persevere in the paths of prostitution, and act as the instruments of heaven's vengeance in propagating distemper and profligacy, in ruining the bodies and debauching the minds of their fellow-creatures. Moved to sympathy and compassion by these considerations, this virtuous band of associates determined to provide a comfortable asylum for female penitents, to which they might fly for shelter from the receptacles of vice, the miseries of life, and the scorn of mankind; where they might indulge the salutary sentiments of remorse, make their peace with heaven, accustom themselves to industry and temperance, and be profitably re-united to society, from which they had been so unhappily dissevered. The plan of this excellent institution being formed, was put in execution by means of voluntary subscription, and the house opened in Goodman's-fields, under the name of the Magdalen-hospital, in the month of August; when 50 petitions were presented by penitent prostitutes, soliciting admittance. Another asylum was also opened by the hand of private charity, on the Surrey-side of Westminster-bridge, for the reception and education of female orphans, and children abandoned by their parents.

Nor was encouragement refused to those who distinguished themselves by extraordinary talents in any branch of the liberal and useful arts and sciences, though no mæcenas appeared among the ministers, and not the least ray of patronage glimmered from the throne. The protection, countenance, and gratification secured in other countries by the institution of academies, and the liberalities of princes, the ingenious in England derived from the generosity of a public, endued with taste and sensibility, eager for improvement, and proud of patronizing extraordinary merit. Several years had already elapsed since a society of private persons was instituted at London, for the encouragement of arts, manufactures, and commerce. It consisted of a president, vice-president, secretary, register, collector, and other officers, elected from a very considerable number of members, who pay a certain yearly contribution for the purposes of the institution. In the course of every year they held eight general meetings in a large assembly-room, built and furnished at the common expence; besides the ordinary meetings of the society, held every week, from the 2d. Wednesday in November to the last Wednesday in May; and, in the intermediate time, on the 1st. and 3d. Wednesday of every month. At these ordinary meetings, provided the number then present exceeded 10, the members had a right to proceed on business, and power to appoint such committees as they should think necessary. The money contributed by this association, after the necessary expence of the society had been deducted, was expended in premiums for planting and husbandry; for discoveries and improvements in chemistry, dying, and mineralogy; for promoting the ingenious arts of drawing, engraving, casting, painting, statuary, and sculpture; for the improvement of manufactures and machines in the various articles of hats, crapes, druggets, mills, marbled-paper, shipblocs, spinning-wheels, toys, yarn, knitting, and weaving. They likewise allotted sums for the advantage of the British colonies in America, and bestowed premiums on those settlers who should excel in curing cochineal, planting logwood-trees, cultivating olive-trees, producing myrtle-wax, making pot-ash, preserving raisins, curing safflour, making silk and wines, importing sturgeon, preparing isinglass, planting hemp and cinnamon, extracting opium and the gum of the persimon-tree, collecting stones of the mango, which should be found to vegetate in the West-Indies; raising silk-grass, and laying out provincial gardens. They, moreover, allowed a gold medal, in honour of him who should compose the best treatise on the arts of peace, containing an historical account of the progressive improvements of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce in the kingdom of England, with the effects of those improvements on the morals and manners of the people, and pointing out the most proper means for their future advancements. In a word, the society is so numerous, the contributions so considerable, the plan so judicially laid, and executed with such discretion and spirit, as to promise much more effectual and extensive advantage to the public than ever accrued from all the boasted academies of Christendom. The artists of London had long maintained a private academy for the improvement in the art of drawing from living figures; but, in order to extend this advantage, which was not attained without difficulty and expence, the duke of Richmond, a young nobleman of the most amiable character, provided a large apartment at Whitehall, for the use of those who studied the arts of painting, sculpture, and engraving; and furnished it with a collection of original plaister casts from the best antique statues and busts at Rome and Florence. Here any learner had liberty to draw, or make models, under the eye and instructions of two eminent artists; and twice a year the munificent founder bestowed premiums of silver medals on the four pupils who excelled the rest in drawing from a certain figure, and making the best model of it in bassorelievo[u].

[u] Among other transactions that distinguish the history of Great-Britain, scarce a year glides away without producing some incident that strongly marks the singular character of the English nation. A very extraordinary instance of this nature, relating to the late duke of Marlborough, we shall record among the events of this year although it derived its origin from the latter end of the last, and cannot be properly enumerated among those occurrences that appertain to general history. Towards the end of November, in the preceding year, the above mentioned nobleman received, by the post, a letter directed "To his grace the duke of Marlborough, with care and speed," and containing this address:

"My LORD,

"As ceremony is an idle thing upon most occasions, more especially to persons in my state of mind, I shall proceed immediately to acquaint you with the motive and end of addressing this epistle to you, which is equally interesting to us both. You are to know then, that my present situation in life is such, that I should prefer annihilation to a continuance in it. Desperate diseases require desperate remedies; and you are the man I have pitched upon, either to make me or unmake yourself. As I never had the honour to live among the great, the tenor of my proposals will not be very courtly; but let that be an argument to enforce a belief of what I am going to write. It has employed my invention for some time to find out a method of destroying another without exposing my own life; that I have accomplished, and defy the law. Now, for the application of it. I am desperate, and must be provided for. You have it in your power; it is my business to make it your inclination to serve me, which you must determine to comply with, by procuring me a genteel support for my life, or your own will be at a period before this sessions of parliament is over. I have more motives than one for singling you out upon this occasion; and I give you this fair warning, because the means I shall make use of are too fatal to be eluded by the power of physics. If you think this of any consequence, you will not fail to meet the author on Sunday next, at ten in the morning or on Monday (if the weather should be rainy on Sunday) near the first tree beyond the stile in Hyde-Park, in the foot-walk to Kensington. Secresy and compliance may preserve you from a double danger of this sort, as there is a certain part of the world where your death has more than been wished for upon other motives. I know the world too well to trust this secret in any breast but my own. A few days will determine me your friend or enemy.

"FELTON.

"You will apprehend that I mean you should, be alone, and depend upon it, that a discovery of any artifice in this affair will be fatal to you. My safety is insured by my silence, for confession only can condemn me."

The duke, in compliance with this strange remonstrance, appeared at

On the 23d day of November both houſes of parliament met at Weſtminſter, when his majeſty being indiſpoſed, the ſeſſion was opened by commiſſion, and the lord-keeper harrangued them to this effect. He told them, his majeſty had directed the lords of the commiſſion to aſſure his parliament that he always received the higheſt ſatisfaction in being able to lay before them any events that might promote the honour and intereſt of his kingdoms: that, in conſequence of their advice, and enabled by the aſſiſtance which they unanimouſly gave, his majeſty had exerted his endeavours to carry on the war in the moſt vigorous manner, in order to attain that deſirable end, always to be wiſhed, a ſafe and honourable peace[x]: that it had pleaſed the Divine Providence to bleſs his meaſures and arms with ſucceſs in ſeveral parts, and to make the enemies of the nation feel that the ſtrength of Great-Britain is not to be provoked with impunity: that the conqueſt of the ſtrong fortreſs of Louiſbourg, with the iſland of Cape-Breton and St. John; the demolition of Frontenac, of the higheſt importance to his operations in America, and the reduction of Senegal, could not fail to bring great diſtreſs on the French commerce and colonies, and, in proportion, to procure a great advantage to thoſe of Great-Britain. He obſerved, that France had alſo been made ſenſible, that whilſt her forces are ſent forth to invade and ravage the dominions of her neighbours, her own coaſts are not inacceſſible to his majeſty's fleets and armies: a truth which ſhe had experienced in the demolition of the works at Cherbourg, erected at a great expence, with a particular view to annoy England, as well as in the loſs of a great number of ſhips and veſſels; but no treatment, however injurious to his majeſty, could tempt him to make retaliation on the innocent ſubjects of that crown. He told them, that in Germany his majeſty's good brother, the king of Pruſſia, and prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, had found full employment for the enemies of France and her confederates, from which the Engliſh operations, both by ſea and in America, had derived the moſt evident advantage; their ſucceſſes, owing, under God, to their able conduct, and the bravery of his majeſty's troops, and thoſe of his allies, having been ſignal and glorious. The king, moreover, commanded them to declare, that the common cauſe of liberty and independency was ſtill making noble and glorious efforts againſt the unnatural union formed to oppreſs it: that the commerce of his ſubjects, the ſource of national riches, had, by the vigilant protection received from his majeſty's fleet, flouriſhed in a manner not to be paralleled during ſuch troubles: in this ſtate of things, he ſaid, the king, in his wiſdom, thought it unneceſſary to uſe many words to perſuade them to bear up againſt all difficulties, effectually to ſtand by and defend his majeſty, vigorouſly to ſupport the king of Pruſſia, and the reſt of his majeſty's allies, and to exert themſelves to reduce their enemies to equitable terms of accommodation. He obſerved to the the time and place appointed, on horſebac and alone, with piſtols before him, and the ſtar of his order diſplayed, that he might be the more eaſily known. He had likewiſe taken the precaution of engaging a friend to attend in the Park, at ſuch a diſtance, however, as ſcarce to be obſervable. He continued ſome time on the ſpot without ſeeing any perſon he could ſuſpect of having wrote the letter, and then rode away; but chancing to turn his head when he reached Hyde-Park corner, he perceived a man ſtanding at the bridge, and looking at the water, within twenty yards of the tree which was deſcribed in the letter. He forthwith rode bac at a gentle pace, and paſſing by the perſon expected to be addreſſed, but as no advance of this kind was made, he, in repaſſing, bowed to the ſtranger, and aſked if he had not ſomething to communicate. The man replying, "No, I don't know you;" the duke told him his name, adding, "Now you know me, I imagine you have ſomething to ſay to me." But he ſtill anſwered in the negative, and the duke rode home. In a day or two after this tranſaction another letter was brought to him, couched in the following terms:

"MY LORD,

"YOU receive this as an acknowledgement of your punctuality as to the time and place of meeting on Sunday laſt, though it was owing to you it anſwered no purpoſe. The pageantry of being armed, and the enſign of your order were uſeleſs, and too conſpicuous. You needed no attendant, the place was not calculated for miſchief, nor was any intended. If your walk in the weſt iſle of Weſtminſter-Abbey, towards 11 o'clock on Sunday next, your ſagacity will point out the perſon whom you will addreſs, by aſking his company to take a turn or two with you. You will not fail, on enquiry, to be acquainted with the name and place of aboad. According to which direction you will pleaſe to ſend 2 or 300l. bank-notes the next day by the penny-poſt. Exert not your curioſity too early: it is in your power to make me grateful on certain terms. I have friends who are faithful, but they do not bark before they bite. "I am, &c. F."

The duke, determined, if poſſible, to unveil this myſtery, repaired to the Abbey at the time preſcribed, and, after having walked up and down for five or ſix minutes, ſaw the very ſame perſon to whom he had ſpoken in Hyde-Park enter the Abbey, with another man of creditable appearance. This laſt, after they had viewed ſome of the monuments, went into the choir, and the other turned bac, advanced towards the duke, who accoſting him, aſked if he had any thing to ſay to him, or any commands for him? He replied, "No, my lord, I have not."—"Sure you have," ſaid the duke, but he perſiſted in his denial. Then the duke leaving him, took ſeveral turns in the iſle, while the ſtranger walked on the other ſide. But nothing further paſſed between them, and although the duke had provided ſeveral perſons in diſguiſe to apprehend the delinquent, he forbore giving the ſignal, that, notwithſtanding appearances, he might run no riſque of injuring an innocent perſon. Not long after this ſecond diſappointment he received a third letter, to the following effect:

"MY LORD

"I AM fully convinced you had a companion on Sunday: I interpret it as owing to the weakneſs of human nature, but ſuch proceeding is far from being ingenuous, and may produce bad effects, whilſt it is impoſſible to anſwer the end propoſed. You will ſee me again ſoon, as it were by accident, and may eaſily find where I go to; in conſequence of which, by being ſent to, I ſhall wait on your grace, but expect to be quite alone, and to converſe in whiſpers: you will likewiſe give your honour, upon meeting, that no part of the converſation ſhall tranſpire. Theſe and the former terms complied with will enſure your ſafety: my revenge, in caſe of non-compliance (or any ſcheme to expoſe me) will be ſlower, but not the leſs ſure; and ſtrong ſuſpicion the utmoſt that can poſſibly enſue upon it, while the chances would be ten-fold againſt you. You will poſſibly be in doubt after the meeting, but it is quite neceſſary the outſide ſhould be a maſk to the in. The family of the Bloods is not extinct, though they are not in my ſcheme."

The expreſſions, "you will ſee me again ſoon, as it were by accident," plainly pointed at the perſon to whom he had ſpoke in the Park, and in the Abbey; nevertheleſs, he ſaw him not again, nor did he hear any thing further of the affair for two months, at the expiration of which the poſt brought him the following letter:

"May it pleaſe your Grace,

"I have reaſon to believe that the ſon of one Barnard, a ſurveyor, in Abingdon-Buildings, Weſtminſter, is acquainted with ſome ſecrets that nearly concern your ſafety: his father is now out of town, which will give you an opportunity of queſtioning him more privately; it would be uſeleſs to your grace, as well as dangerous to me, to appear more publicly in this affair.

"Your ſincere friend,

"ANONYMOUS.

"He frequently goes to Storey's-Gate coffee-houſe."

In about a week after this intimation was received, the duke ſent a perſon to the coffee-houſe, to enquire for mr. Barnard, and tell him he would be glad to ſpeak to him. The meſſage was delivered, and Barnard declared he would wait upon his grace next Thurſday, at half an hour after 10 in the the morning. He was punctual to his appointment, and no ſooner appeared than the duke recogniſed him to be the perſon to whom he had ſpoke in the Park and the Abbey. Having conducted him into an apartment, and ſhut the door, he aſked, as before, if he had any thing to communicate; and was anſwered, as formerly, in the negative. Then the duke repeated every circumſtance of this ſtrange tranſaction; to which Barnard liſtened with attention and ſurpriſe, yet without exhibiting any marks of conſcious guilt or confuſion. The duke obſerving that it was matter of aſtoniſhment to ſee letters of ſuch import written with the correctneſs of a ſcholar, the other replied, that a man might be very poor and very learned at the ſame time. When he ſaw the fourth letter, in which his name was mentioned, with the circumſtance of his father's abſence, he ſaid, 'It is very odd, my father was then out of town.' An expreſſion the more remarkable, as the letter was without date, and he could not, as an innocent man, be ſuppoſed to know at what time it was written. The duke having made him acquainted with the particulars, told him, that if he was innocent he ought to uſe his endeavours to detect the writer of the letters, eſpecially of the laſt, in which he was expreſly named. To this admonition he returned no other anſwer but a ſmile, and then withdrew.—He was afterwards taken into cuſtody, and tried at the Old-Bailey, for ſending a threatening letter, contrary to the ſtatute; but no evidence could be found to prove the letters were of his hand-writing; nor did any preſumption appear againſt him, except his being in Hyde-Park, and in Weſtminſter-Abbey, at the time and place appointed in the two firſt letters. On the other hand, mr. Barnard proved, that on the Sunday, when he ſaw the duke in Hyde-Park, he was on his way to Kenſington, on particular buſineſs, by his father's order, ſignified to him that very morning: that he accordingly went thither, and dined with his uncle, in company with ſeveral other perſons, to whom he related what had paſſed between the duke of Marlborough and him in the Park: that his being afterwards in Weſtminſter-Abbey was the effect of mere accident: that mr. James Greenwood, his kinſman, who had lain the preceding night at his father's houſe, deſired him to dreſs himſelf, that they might walk together in the Park; and he did not comply with his requeſt till after much ſollicitation: that he propoſed to enter the Park without paſſing through the Abbey, but was prevailed upon by mr. Greenwood, who expreſſed a deſire of ſeeing the newly-erected monument of general Hargrave: that as he had formerly communicated to his friend the ſtrange circumſtance of the duke's ſpeaking to him in Hyde-Park, mr. Greenwood no ſooner ſaw that noblemaſ in the Abbey, than he gave notice to mr. Barnard, who was very ſhort-ſighted: and that, from his paſſing them ſeveral times, concluding he wanted to ſpeak with mr. Barnard alone, he quitted him, and retired into the choir, that they might commune together without interruption. It likewiſe appeared from undoubted evidence, that Barnard had often mentioned openly, to his friends and acquaintance, the circumſtances of what paſſed between him and the duke in the Park and in the Abbey: that his father was a man of unblemiſhed reputation, and in affluent circumſtances: that he himſelf was never reduced to any want, or ſuch exigence as might impel him to any deſperate methods of obtaining money: that his fidelity had been often tried, and his life always irreproachable. For theſe reaſons he was acquitted of the crime laid to his charge, and the myſtery remains to this day undiſcovered.

After all, the author of the letters does not ſeem to have had any real deſign to extort money, becauſe the ſcheme was very ill calculated for that purpoſe, and, indeed, could not poſſibly take effect, without the moſt imminent riſque of detection. Perhaps his aim was nothing more than to gratify a petulance and peculiarity of humour, by alarming the duke, exciting the curioſity of the public, puzzling the multitude, and giving riſe to a thouſand ridiculous conjectures. If any thing more was intended, and the duke earneſtly deſired to know the extent of the ſcheme, he might, when he cloſeted the perſon ſuſpected, have encouraged him to a declaration, by promiſing inviolable ſecrecy on his word and honour, in which any man would have confided as a ſacred obligation. On the whole, it is ſurpriſing that the death of the duke, which happened in the courſe of this year, was never attributed to the ſecret practices of this incendiary correſpondent who had given him to underſtand, that his vengeance, though ſlow, would not be the leſs certain.

[x] In the month of Auguſt, the king in quality of elector of Hanover, having occaſion for 200,000l. a loan by ſubſcription for that ſum was opened at the Bank, and filled immediately by ſeven or eight money dealers of London.

houſe of commons, that the uncommon extent of this war, in different parts, occaſioned it to be uncommonly expenſive: that the king had ordered them to declare to the commons, that he ſincerely lamented, and deeply felt for the burthens of his people: that the ſeveral eſtimates were ordered to be laid before them; and that he deſired only ſuch ſupplies as ſhould be requiſite to puſh the war with advantage, and be adequate to the neceſſary ſervices. In the laſt place, he aſſured them the king took ſo much ſatisfaction in that good harmony which ſubſiſted among his faithful ſubjects, that it was more proper for him now to thank them for it, than to repeat his exhortation to it: that this union, neceſſary at all times, was more eſpecially ſo in ſuch critical conjunctures; and his majeſty doubted not but the good effects the nation had found from it would be the ſtrongeſt motives to them to purſue it.—The reader will, no doubt, be ſurpriſed to find this harangue abound with harſhneſs of period and inelegancy of expreſſion: he will wonder that, in particulariſing the ſucceſſes of the year in America, no mention is made of the reduction of fort Du Queſne on the river Ohio; a place of great importance, both from its ſtrength and ſituation, the erection of which had been one great motive to the war between the two nations: but he will be ſtill more ſurpriſed to hear it declared from the throne, that the operations, both by ſea and in America, had derived the moſt evident advantage from the war in Germany. An aſſertion the more extraordinary, as the Britiſh miniſtry, in their anſwer to the parallel, which we have already mentioned, had expreſly affirmed, that 'none but ſuch as are acquainted with the maritime force of England can believe, that without a diverſion on the continent, to employ part of the enemy's force, ſhe is not in a condition to hope for ſucceſs, and maintain her ſuperiority at ſea.—That they muſt be very ignorant, indeed, who imagine that the forces of England are not able to reſiſt thoſe of France, unleſs the latter be hindered from turning all her efforts to the ſea.' It is very remarkably, that the Britiſh miniſtry ſhould declare that the war in Germany was favourable to the Engliſh operations by ſea and in America; and almoſt in the ſame breath accuſe the French king of having fomented that war. Let us ſuppoſe that France had no war to maintain in Europe; and aſk in what manner ſhe, in that caſe, would have oppoſed the progreſs of the Britiſh arms by ſea, and in America? Her navy was reduced to ſuch a condition that it durſt not quit her harbours; her merchant-ſhips were all taken, her mariners confined in England, and the ſea was covered with Britiſh cruizers: in theſe circumſtances, what expedients could ſhe have contrived for ſending ſupplies, and re-enforcements to America, or for oppoſing the naval armaments of Great-Britain in any other part of the world?—None. Without ſhips and mariners, her troops, ammunition, and ſtores were, in this reſpect, as uſeleſs as money to a man ſhip-wrecked on a deſolate iſland. But, granting that the war in Germany had, in ſome meaſure, diverted the attention of the French miniſtry from the proſecution of their operations in America (and this is granting more than ought to be allowed) the queſtion is not, whether the hoſtilities upon the continent of Europe prevented France from ſending a great number of troops to Canada; but whether the war in Germany was either neceſſary or expedient for diſtreſſing the French more effectually in other parts of the world? Surely every intelligent man of candour muſt anſwer in the negative. The expence incurred by England for ſubſidies and armies in the empire exceeded 3,000,000l. ſterling annually; and this enormous expence, without being able to protect Hanover, only ſerved to keep the war alive in different parts of Germany. Had one-half of this ſum been employed in augmenting and extending the naval armaments of Great-Britain, and in re-enforcing her troops in America and the Weſt-Indies, France would have been, at this day, deprived of all her ſugar colonies, as well as of her ſettlements on the continent of America; and being abſolutely cut off from theſe ſources of wealth, would have found it impracticable either to gratify her ſubſidiaries, or to maintain ſuch formidable armies to annoy her neighbours. Theſe are truths, which will appear to the conviction of the public, when the illuſive ſpells of unſubſtantial victory are diſſolved, and time ſhall have diſperſed the thic miſts of prejudice, which now ſeem to darken and perplex the underſtanding of the people.

The conduct of the adminiſtration was ſo agreeable to both houſes of parliament, that in their addreſs to the throne they expreſſed their unſhaken zeal and loyalty to his majeſty's perſon, congratulated him on the ſucceſs of his arms, and promiſed to ſupport his meaſures and allies with ſteadineſs and alacrity [y]. It was proabably in conſequence of this aſſurance that a new treaty between Great-Britain and Pruſſia was concluded at London on the ſeventh day of December, importing, That as the burthenſome war in which the king of Pruſſia is engaged lays him under the neceſſity of making freſh efforts to defend himſelf againſt the multitude of enemies who attac his dominions, he is obliged to take new meaſures with the king of England, for their reciprocal defence and ſafety; and his Britannick majeſty hath, at the ſame time, ſignified his earneſt deſire to ſtrengthen the friendſhip ſubſiſting between the two courts, and, in conſequence thereof, to conclude a formal convention, for granting to his Pruſſian majeſty ſpeedy and powerful aſſiſtance, their majeſties have nominated and authoriſed their miniſters to concert and ſettle the following articles:—All formal treaties between the two crowns, particularly that ſigned at Weſtminſter on the 16th day of January, in the year 1756, and the convention of the 11th of April, in the year 1758, are confirmed by the preſent convention of the 11th of April, in the year 1758, in their whole tenor, as if they were herein inſerted word for word. The king of Great-Britain ſhall cauſe to be paid at London, to ſuch perſon or perſons as ſhall be authoriſed by the king of Pruſſia for that end, the ſum of 4,000,000 of rix-dollars, making 670,000l. ſterling, at one payment, immediately on the exchange of the ratifications, if the king of Pruſſia ſhall ſo require. His Pruſſian majeſty ſhall employ the ſaid ſum in ſupporting and augmenting his forces, which ſhall act in ſuch manner as ſhall be of the greateſt ſervice to the common cauſe, and contribute moſt to the mutual defence and ſafety of their ſaid majeſties. The king of Great-Britain, both as king and elector, and the king of Pruſſia, reciprocally bind themſelves not to conclude with the powers that have taken part in the preſent war any treaty of peace, truce, or other ſuch like convention, but by common advice and conſent, each expreſly including therein the other. The ratification of the preſent convention ſhall be exchanged within ſix weeks, or ſooner, if poſſible. In effect, this treaty was no other than a renewal of the ſubſidy from year to year, becauſe it was not thought proper to ſtipulate in the firſt ſubſidiary convention an annual ſupply of ſuch importance until the war ſhould be terminated, leſt the people of England ſhould be alarmed at the proſpect of ſuch ſucceſſive burthens, and the complaiſance of the commons be in ſome future ſeſſion exhauſted. On the whole, this was perhaps the moſt extraordinary treaty that ever was concluded; for it contains no ſpecification of articles, except the payment of the ſubſidy: every other article was left to the interpretation of his Pruſſian majeſty.

[1759] The parliament, having performed the ceremony of addreſſes to the throne, immediately proceeded to the great work of the ſupply. The two committees in the houſe of commons were immediately eſtabliſhed, and continued by adjournments to the month of May, by the 23d day of which all their reſolutions were taken. They voted 60,000 men, including 14,845 marines, for the ſervice of the enſuing year; and for the operations by land, a body of troops amounting to 52,553 effective men, beſides the auxiliaries of Hanover, Heſſe, Brunſwick, Saxe-Gotha, and Buckebourg, to the number of 50,000, and five battalions on the Iriſh eſtabliſhment, in actual ſervice in America and Africa. For the maintenance of the 60,000 men employed in the ſea-ſervice, they granted 3,120,000l. for the land-forces, 1,256,130l. 15s. 2d. for the charge of the additional five battalions, 40,879l. 13s. 9d. for the pay of the general and ſtaff-officers, and hoſpitals of the land-forces, 52,484l. 1s. 8d. for maintaining the garriſons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova-Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape-Breton, and Senegal, the ſum of 742,531l. 5s. 7d. for the charge of ordnance for land-ſervice, 220,789l. 11s. 9d. for extraordinary ſervice performed by the ſame office, and not provided for by parliament in the courſe of the preceding year, 323,987l. 13s. 3d. for the ordinary of the navy, including half-pay to ſea officers, 238,491l. 9s. 8d. towards the ſupport of Greenwich-hoſpital, and for the out-penſioners of Chelſea-college, the ſum of 36,000l. They allotted for one year's expence incurred by the foreign troops in the pay of Great-Britain, 1,238,177l. 19s. 10d. over and above 60,000l. for enabling his majeſty to fulfil his engagements with the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, purſuant to the ſeperate article of a new treaty concluded between them in the month of January of this current year, ſtipulating that this ſum ſhould be paid to his ſerene highneſs, in order to facilitate the means by which he might again fix his reſidence in his own dominions, and by his preſence give freſh courage to his faithful ſubjects. Eighty thouſand pounds were granted for enabling his majeſty to diſcharge the like ſum, raiſed in purſuance of an act paſſed in the preceding ſeſſion, and charged upon the firſt aids or ſupplies to be granted in this ſeſſion of parliament. The ſum of 200,000l. was voted towards the building and repairing ſhips of war for the enſuing year. Fifteen thouſand pounds were allowed for improving London-bridge; and 40,000l. on account for the Foundling-hoſpital. For the charge of tranſports to be employed in the courſe of the year they aſſigned 667,721l. 19s. 7d. for maintaining the colonies of Nova-Scotia and Georgia they beſtowed 25,238l. 13s. 5d. To replace ſums taken from the ſinking-fund, 33,252l. 18s. 10½d. for maintaining the Britiſh forts and ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa, 10,000l. and for paying off the mortgage on an eſtate deviſed for the endowment of a profeſſorſhip in the univerſity of Cambridge, the ſum of 1280l. For the expence of the militia they voted 90,000l. for extraordinary expences relating to the land-forces, incurred in the courſe of laſt year, and unprovided for by parliament, the ſum of 466,785l. 10s. 5¾d. For the purchaſe of certain lands and hereditaments, in order to ſecure the king's docs at Portſmouth, Chatham, and Plymouth, they granted 36,966l. 2s. 10d. They voted 200,000l. for enabling his majeſty to give proper compenſations to the reſpective provinces in North-America for the expences they had incurred in levying and maintaining troops for the ſervice of the public. They granted 20,000l. to the Eaſt-India company, towards enabling them to defray the expence of a military force in their ſettlements; and the ſame ſum was granted for carrying on the fortifications to ſecure the harbour of Milford. To make good ſeveral ſums iſſued by his majeſty, for indemnifying the innholders and victuallers of Hampſhire for the expences they had incurred in quartering the Heſſian auxiliaries in England; for an addition to the ſalaries of judges, and other leſs conſiderable purpoſes, they allowed the ſum of 26,178l. 16s. 6d. Finally, they voted one million, upon account, for enabling the king to defray any extraordinary expence of the war, incurred, or to be incurred, for the ſervice of the current year; and to take all ſuch meaſures as might be neceſſary to diſappoint or defeat any enterprizes or deſigns of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs ſhould require. The ſum of all the grants voted by the committee of ſupply amounted to 12,761,310l. 19s. 5d.

[y] That the charge of diſaffection to the king's perſon, which was ſo loudly trumpeted by former miniſters and their adherents againſt thoſe who had honeſty and courage to oppoſe the meaſures of a weak and corrupt adminiſtration, was entirely falſe, and without foundation, appeared at this juncture, when in the midſt of a cruel, oppreſſive, and continental war, maintained by the blood and treaſure of Great-Britain, all oppoſition ceaſed in both houſes of parliament. The addreſſes of thanks to his majeſty, which are always dictated by the immediate ſervants of the crown, were unanimouſly adopted in both houſes, and not only couched in terms of applauſe, but even inflated with expreſſions of rapture and admiration. They declared themſelves ſenſible, that the operations of Great-Britain, both by ſea and in America, had received the moſt evident and important advantages from the maintenance of the war in Germany, and ſeemed eager to eſpouſe any meaſure that might gratify the inclinations of the ſovereign.

The commons were ſtill employed in deliberations on ways and means on the 22d day of May, when mr. ſecretary Pitt communicated to them a meſſage from the king, couched in theſe terms: 'His majeſty, relying on the experienced zeal and affection of his faithful commons, and conſidering that, in this critical conjuncture, emergencies may ariſe, which may be of the utmoſt importance, and be attended with the moſt pernicious conſequences, if proper means ſhould not immediately be applied to prevent or defeat them, is deſirous that this houſe will enable him to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred, or to be incurred, for the ſervice of the year 1759, and to take all ſuch meaſures as may be neceſſary to diſappoint or defeat any enterprizes or deſigns of his enemies, and as the exigencies of affairs may require.' This meſſage being read, a motion was made, and agreed to nem. con. that it ſhould be referred to the committee, who forthwith formed upon it the reſolution, whereby one million was granted, to be raiſed by loans or exchequer-bills chargeable on the firſt aids that ſhould be given in the next ſeſſion. This produced a bill enabling his majeſty to raiſe the ſum of one million, for the uſes and purpoſes therein mentioned, comprehending a clauſe, allowing the Bank of England to advance, on the credit of the loan therein mentioned, any ſum not exceeding a million, notwithſtanding the act of the 5th and 6th years in the reign of William and Mary, by which the Bank was eſtabliſhed.

The bills relating ſolely to the ſupply being diſcuſſed and expedited, the houſe proceeded as uſual to enact other laws for the advantage of the community. Petitions having been preſented by the cities of Briſtol and New-Sarum, alledging, that ſince the laws prohibiting the making of low wines and ſpirits from grain, meal, and flour had been in force, the commonality appeared more ſober, healthy, and induſtrious; repreſenting the ill conſequences which they apprehend would attend the repeal of theſe laws, and therefore praying their continuance; a committee of the whole houſe reſolved that the prohibition to export corn ſhould be continued to the 24th day of December, in the year 1759; ſubject nevertheleſs to ſuch proviſions for ſhortening the ſaid term of its continuance as ſhould therefore be made by any act of that ſeſſion, or by his majeſty, with the advice of his privy-council, during the receſs of parliament; that the act for diſcontinuing the duties upon corn and flour imported, or brought in as prize, was not proper to be further continued; and that the prohibition to make low wines or ſpirits from any ſort of grain, meal, or flour ſhould be continued to the 24th day of December, in the year 1759. Before the bill was formed on theſe reſolutions, petitions arrived from Liverpool and Bath, to the ſame purport as thoſe of Briſtol and Sarum; while, on the other hand, a remonſtrance was preſented by a great number of the malt diſtillers of the city and ſuburbs of London, alledging, that it having been deemed expedient to prohibit the diſtilling of ſpirits from any ſort of grain to the 24th day of December then inſtant, ſome of the petitioners had entirely ceaſed to carry on the buſineſs of diſtilling, while others, merely with a view to preſerve their cuſtomers, the compound diſtillers, and employ ſome of their ſervants, horſes, and utenſils, had ſubmitted to carry on the diſtillation of ſpirits from melaſſes and ſugars under great diſadvantages, in full hope that the ſaid reſtraint would ceaſe at the expiration of the limited time, or at leaſt when the neceſſity which occaſioned that reſtraint ſhould be removed; that it was with great concern they obſerved a bill would be brought in for protracting the ſaid prohibition, at a time when the price of all manner of grain, and particularly of wheat and barley, was conſiderably reduced, and, as they humbly conceived, at a reaſonable medium. They expatiated on the great loſs they, as well as many traders and artificers dependents upon them, muſt ſuſtain, in caſe the ſaid bill ſhould be paſſed into a law. They prayed the houſe to take theſe circumſtances into conſideration, and either permit them to carry on the diſtillation from wheat, malt, and other grain, under ſuch reſtrictions as ſhould be judged neceſſary; or to grant them ſuch other relief, in reſpect of their ſeveral loſſes and incumbrances, as to the houſe ſhould ſeem reaſonable and expedient. This petition, though ſtrenuouſly urged by a powerful and clamorous body without doors, did not meet with great encouragement within. It was ordered to lie upon the table, and an inſtruction was given to the committee, empowering them to receive a clauſe or clauſes to allow the tranſportation of certain quantities of meal, flour, bread, and biſcuit to the iſlands of Guernſey and Jerſey, for the ſole uſe of the inhabitants; and another to prohibit the making of low wines and ſpirits from bran. Much more attention was paid to a petition of ſeveral farmers in the county of Norfolk, repreſenting, that their farms conſiſted chiefly of arable land, which produced much greater quantities of corn than could be conſumed within that county; that in the laſt harveſt there was a great and plentiful crop of all ſorts of grain, the greateſt part of which had, by unfavourable weather, been rendered unfit for ſale at London, or other markets, for home conſumption; that large quantities of malt were then lying at London, ariſing chiefly from the crops of barley growing in the year 1757, the ſale of which was ſtagnated; that the petitioners being informed the houſe had ordered in a bill to continue the prohibition of corn exported, they begged leave to obſerve, that, ſhould it paſs into a law, it would be extremely prejudicial to all, and ruin many farmers of that county, as they had offered their corn for ſale at divers ports and markets of the ſaid county; but the merchants refuſed to buy it at any price, alledging its being unfit for the London market, the great quantity of corn with which that market was already overſtocked, and their not being allowed either to export it, or make it into malt for exportation: they, therefore, prayed this prohibition might be removed, or they the petitioners indulged with ſome other kind of relief. Although this remonſtrance was duely conſidered, the bill paſſed with the amendments, becauſe of the proviſo, by which his majeſty in council was empowered to ſhorten the date of the prohibition, with reſpect to the exportation of corn, during the receſs of parliament: but the temporary reſtraint laid upon diſtillation was made abſolute, without any ſuch condition, to the no ſmall diſappointment and mortification of the diſtillers, who had ſpared no pains and expence, by private ſollicitation and ſtrenuous diſpute in the public papers, to recommend their cauſe to the favour of the community. They urged, that malt-ſpirits, when uſed in moderation, far from being prejudicial to the health of individuals, were in many damp and marſhy parts of the kingdom abſolutely neceſſary for preſerving the field-labourers from agues, and other diſtempers produced by the cold and moiſture of the climate; that if they were debarred the uſe of malt-ſpirits, they would have recourſe to French brandy, with which, as they generally reſided near the ſea coaſt, the ſmugglers would provide them almoſt as cheap as the malt-ſpirits could be afforded: thus the increaſed conſumption of French ſpirit would drain the nation of ready money to a conſiderable amount, and prejudice the king's revenue in the ſame proportion. They obſerved, that many diſtillers had already quitted that branch of trade, and diſpoſed of their material; and all of them would probably take the ſame reſolution, ſhould the bill paſs into a law, as no man could foreſee when the prohibition would ceaſe, ſhould it be continued at a time when all ſorts of grain abounded in ſuch plenty; that the very waſte of materials by diſuſe, over and above the lying out of the money, would be of great prejudice to the proprietor: thus the buſineſs of diſtilling, by which ſo many families were ſupported, would be baniſhed from the kingdom entirely: eſpecially, as the expence of eſtabliſhing a large diſtillery was ſo great, that no man would chooſe to employ his money for this purpoſe, judging from experience, that ſome future accidental ſcarcity of corn might induce the legiſlature to interpoſe a ruinous delay in this branch of buſineſs. They affirmed, that, from the exceſſive uſe of malt-ſpirits, no good argument could be drawn againſt this branch of traffic, no more than againſt any other conveniency of life; that the exceſſive uſe of common beer or ale was prejudicial to the health and morals of the people, yet no perſon ever thought of putting an end to the practice of brewing, in order to prevent the abuſe of brewed liquors. They urged, that in all parts of Great-Britain there are ſome parcels of land that produce nothing to advantage, but a coarſe kind of barley, called big, which, though neither fit for brewing or for baking, may nevertheleſs be uſed in the diſtillery, and is accordingly purchaſed by thoſe concerned in this branch, at ſuch an encouraging price, as enables many farmers to pay a higher rent to their landlords than they could otherwiſe afford: that there are every year ſome parcels of all ſorts of grain ſo damaged by unſeaſonable weather, or other accidents, as to be rendered altogether unfit for bread or brewery, and would prove a very great misfortune to the farmer, if there was no diſtillery, for the uſe of which he could ſell his damaged commodity. They aſſerted, that malt-ſpirits were abſolutely neceſſary for proſecuting ſome branches of foreign commerce, particularly the trade to the coaſt of Africa, for which traffic no aſſortment could be made up without a large quantity of geneva, of which the natives are ſo fond, that they will not traffic with any merchant who has not a conſiderable quantity, not only for ſale, but alſo for preſents to their chiefs and rulers: that the merchants of Great-Britain muſt either have this commodity of their own produce, or import it at a great national expence from Holland: that the charge of this importation, together with the duties payable upon it, ſome part of which is not to be drawn bac on exportation, will render it impoſſible for the traders to ſell it ſo cheap on the coaſt of Africa as it might be ſold by the Dutch, who are the great rivals of Great-Britain in this branch of commerce. To theſe arguments, all of which were plauſible, and ſome of them unanſwerable, it was replied, that malt-ſpirits might be conſidered as a fatal and bewitching poiſon, which had actually debauched the minds and enervated the bodies of the common people to a very deplorable degree; that, without entering further into a compariſon between the uſe and abuſe of the two liquors, beer and geneva, it would be ſufficient to obſerve, that the uſe beer and ale had produced none of thoſe dreadful effects which were the conſequences of drinking geneva; and ſince the prohibition of the diſtillery of malt-ſpirits had taken place, the common people were become apparently more ſober, decent, healthy, and induſtrious: a circumſtance ſufficient to induce the legiſlature not only to intermit, but even totally to aboliſh the practice of diſtillation, which has ever been productive of ſuch intoxication, riot, diſorder, and diſtemper among the lower claſs of the people, as might be deemed the greateſt evils incident to a well regulated common-wealth. Their aſſertion with reſpect to the courſe kind of barley, called big, was contradicted as a deviation from truth, inaſmuch as it was uſed in making malt, as well as in making bread: and with reſpect to damaged corn: thoſe who underſtood the nature of grain affirmed, that if it was ſpoiled to ſuch a degree as to be altogether unfit for either of theſe purpoſes, the diſtillers would not purchaſe it at ſuch a price as would indemnify the farmer for the charge of threſhing and carriage; for the diſtillers are very ſenſible that their greateſt profit is derived from their diſtilling the malt made from the beſt barley, ſo that the increaſe of the produce far exceeded in proportion the advance of the price. It was not however, an eaſy matter to prove that the diſtillation of malt-ſpirits was not neceſſary to an advantageous proſecution of the commerce on the coaſt of Guinea, as well as among the Indians in ſome parts of North-America. Certain it is, that in theſe branches of traffic the want of geneva may be ſupplied by ſpirits diſtilled from ſugars and melaſſes. After all, it muſt be owned, that the good and ſalutary effects of the prohibition were viſible in every part of the kingdom, and no evil conſequences enſued, except a diminution of the revenue in this article: a conſideration which, at all times, ought to be ſacrificed to the health and morals of the people; nor will this conſideration be found of any great weight, when we reflect that the leſs the malt-ſpirit is drunk, the greater quantity of beer and ale will be conſumed, and the produce of the duties and exciſe upon the brewery be augmented accordingly.

In the mean time, all ſorts of grain continuing to fall in price, and great plenty appearing in every part of the kingdom, the juſtices of the peace, and of the grand-juries aſſembled at the general quarter ſeſſions of the peace held for the county of Norfolk, compoſed and preſented to the houſe of commons, in the beginning of February, a petition, repreſenting, that the weather proving unfavourable in the harveſt, great part of the barley raiſed in that county was much damaged, and rendered unfit for any other uſe than that of being made into malt for exportation; that, unleſs it ſhould be ſpeedily manufactured for that purpoſe, it would be entirely ſpoiled, and periſh in the hands of the growers; a loſs that muſt be very ſenſibly felt by the land-owners: they, therefore, entreated that leave might be given for the exportation of malt; and that they might be favoured with ſuch further relief, as to the houſe ſhould ſeem juſt and reaſonable. In conſequence of this petition, the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee, to deliberate upon the ſubject; and as it appeared, upon examination, that the price of grain was reduced very low, and great abundance diffuſed through the kingdom, they reſolved, that the continuance of that part of the act, prohibiting the exportation of grain, ought to be abridged and ſhortened, and the exportation of theſe commodities allowed, under proper regulations with reſpect to the time of ſuch exportation, and the allowance of bounties thereupon. A bill being founded on theſe reſolutions, was diſcuſſed, and underwent ſeveral amendments: at length, it was ſent with a new title to the lords, who paſſed it without further alteration, and then it obtained the royal ſanction.

While this affair was under the deliberation of the committee, the commons unanimouſly iſſued an order for leave to bring in a bill to continue, for a limited time, the act of laſt ſeſſion, permitting the importation of ſalted beef from Ireland into Great-Britain, with an inſtruction to receive a clauſe extending this permiſſion to all ſorts of ſalted pork or hog meat, as the officers of the cuſtom-houſe had refuſed to admit hams from Ireland to an entry. The bill likewiſe received another conſiderable alteration, importing, that inſtead of the duty of 1s. 3d. charged by the former act on every hundred weight of ſalted beef or pork imported from Ireland, which was found not adequate to the duty payable for ſuch a quantity of ſalt as is requiſite to be uſed in curing and ſalting thereof; and to prevent as well the expence to the revenue, as the detriment and loſs which would accrue to the owner and importer, from opening the caſks in which the proviſion is generally depoſited, with the pickle or brine proper for preſerving the ſame, in order to aſcertain the net weight of the proviſion liable to the ſaid duties—for theſe reaſons it was enacted, that from and after the 24th day of laſt December, and during the continuance of this act, a duty of 3s. 4d. ſhould be paid upon importation for every barrel or caſk of ſalted beef or pork containing 32 gallons; and 1s. 3d. for every hundred weight of ſalted beef, called dried beef, dried neats tongues, or dried hog-meat, and ſo in proportion for any greater or leſſer quantity.

Repeated complaints having been made to the government by neutral nations, eſpecially the Dutch, that their ſhips had been plundered, and their crews mal-treated, by ſome of the Engliſh privateers, the legiſlature reſolved to provide effectually againſt any ſuch outrageous practices for the future: and with this the commons ordered a bill to be brought in, for amending and explaining an act of the 29th year of his late majeſty's reign, intituled, "An act for the encouragement of ſeamen, and more "ſpeedy and effectual manning of his majeſty's navy." While the committee was employed in peruſing commiſſions and papers relative to private ſhips of war, that they might be fully acquainted with the nature of the ſubject, a conſiderable number of merchants and others, inhabiting the iſlands of Guernſey and Jerſey, preſented a petition to the houſe, alledging, that the inhabitants of thoſe iſlands, which lie in the Britiſh channel, within ſight of the French coaſt, had now, as well as in former wars, embarked their fortunes in equipping ſmall privateers, which uſed to run in cloſe with the French ſhore, and being diſguiſed like fiſhing-boats, had not only taken a conſiderable number of prizes, to the great annoyance of the enemy, but alſo obtained material intelligence of their deſigns, on many important occaſions; that theſe ſervices could not be performed by large veſſels, which durſt not approach ſo near the coaſt, and indeed could not appear without giving the alarm, which was communicated from place to place by appointed ſignals. Being informed that a bill was depending, in order to prohibit privateers of ſmall burthen, they declared that ſuch a law, if extended to privateers equipped in thoſe iſlands, would ruin ſuch as had inveſted their fortunes in ſmall privateers; and not only deprive the kingdom of the before-mentioned advantages, but expoſe Great-Britain to infinite prejudice from the ſmall armed veſſels of France, which the enemy in that caſe would pour abroad over the whole channel, to the great annoyance of navigation and commerce. They prayed, therefore, that ſuch privateers as belonged to the iſlands of Guernſey and Jerſey might be wholly excepted from the penalties contained in the bill, or that they (the petitioners) might be heard by their counſel, and be indulged with ſuch relief as the houſe ſhould judge expedient. This repreſentation being referred to the conſideration of the committee, produced divers amendments to the bill, which, at length, obtained the royal aſſent, and contained theſe regulations: That, after the 1ſt day of January in the preſent year, no commiſſion ſhould be granted to a privateer in Europe under the burthen of 100 tons, the force of ten carriage guns, being three-pounders or above, with 40 men at the leaſt, unleſs the lords of the admiralty, or perſons authoriſed by them, ſhould think fit to grant the ſame to any ſhip of inferior force or burthen, the owners thereof giving ſuch bail or ſecurity as ſhould be preſcribed: that the lords of the admiralty might at any time revoke, by an order in writing under their hands, any commiſſion granted to a privateer; this revocation being ſubject to an appeal to his majeſty in council, whoſe determination ſhould be final: that, previous to the granting any commiſſion, the perſons propoſing to be bound, and give ſecurity, ſhould ſeverally make oath of their being reſpectively worth more money than the ſum for which they were then to be bound, over and above the payment of all their juſt debts: that perſons applying for ſuch commiſſions ſhould make application in writing, and therein ſet forth a particular and exact deſcription of the veſſel, ſpecifying the burthen, and the number and nature of the guns on board, to what place belonging, as well as the name or names of the principal owner or owners, and the number of men: theſe particulars to be inſerted in the commiſſion, and every commander to produce ſuch commiſſion to the cuſtom-houſe officer who ſhould examine the veſſel, and, finding her anſwer the deſcription, give a certificate thereof gratis, to be deemed a neceſſary clearance, without which the commander ſhould not depart: that if, after the 1ſt day of July, any captain of a privateer ſhould agree for the ranſom of any neutral veſſel, or the cargo, or any part thereof, after it ſhould have been taken as prize, and in purſuance of ſuch agreement ſhould actually diſcharge ſuch prize, he ſhould be deemed guilty of piracy; but that with reſpect to contraband merchandiſe, he might take it on board his own ſhip, with the conſent of the commander of the neutral veſſel, and then ſet her at liberty; and that no perſon ſhould purloin or embezzle the ſaid merchandiſe before condemnation: that no judge, or other perſon belonging to the court of admiralty, ſhould be concerned in any privateer: that owners of veſſels, not being under 50, or above 100 tons, whoſe commiſſions are declared void, ſhould be indemnified for their loſs by the public: that a court of oyer and terminer, and gaol delivery, for the trial of offences committed within the juriſdiction of the Admiralty, ſhould be held twice a-year in the Old-Bailey at London, or in ſuch other place within England as the board of admiralty ſhould appoint: that the judge of any court of admiralty, after an appeal interpoſed, as well as before, ſhould, at the requeſt of the captor or claimant, iſſue an order for appraiſing the capture, when the parties do not agree upon the value, and an inventory to be taken; then exact ſecurity for the full value, and the cauſe of capture, to be delivered to the perſon giving ſuch ſecurity: but, ſhould objection be made to the taking ſuch ſecurity, the judge ſhould, at the requeſt of either party, order ſuch merchandiſe to be entered, landed, and ſold at public auction, and the produce be depoſited at the Bank, or in ſome public ſecurities; and in caſe of ſecurity being given, the judge ſhould grant a paſs in favour of the capture. Finally, the force of this act was limited to the duration of the then war with France only. This regulation very clearly demonſtrated, that whatever violences might have been committed on the ſhips of neutral nations, they were by no means countenanced by the legiſlature, or the body of the people.

Every circumſtance relating to the reformation of the marine muſt be an important object to a nation whoſe wealth and power depend upon navigation and commerce: but a conſideration of equal weight was the eſtabliſhment of the militia, which, notwithſtanding the repeated endeavours of the parliament, was found ſtill incomplete, and in want of further aſſiſtance from the legiſlature. His majeſty having, by the chancellor of the exchequer, recommended to the houſe the making ſuitable proviſion for defraying the charges of the militia during the current year, the accounts of the expence already incurred by this eſtabliſhment were referred to the committee of ſupply, who, after having duly peruſed them, reſolved, that 90,000l. ſhould be granted on account, towards defraying the charges of pay and clothing for the militia, from the laſt day of the laſt year to the twenty-fifth day of March in the year 1760, and for repaying a ſum advanced by the king for this ſervice. Leave was given to bring in one bill purſuant to this reſolution, and another to enforce the execution of the laws relating to the militia, remove certain difficulties, and prevent the inconveniencies by which it might be attended. So intent were the majority on both ſides upon this national meaſure, that they not only carried both bills to the throne, where they received the royal aſſent; but they preſented an addreſs to the king, deſiring his majeſty would give directions to his lieutenants of the ſeveral counties, ridings, and places in England, to uſe their utmoſt diligence and attention for carrying into execution the ſeveral acts of parliament relating to the militia. By this time all the individuals that conſtituted the repreſentatives of the people, except ſuch as actually ſerved in the army, were become very well diſpoſed towards this inſtitution. Thoſe who really wiſhed well to their country had always exerted themſelves in its favour: and it was now likewiſe eſpouſed by thoſe who foreſaw that the eſtabliſhment of a national militia would enable the adminiſtration to ſend the greater number of regular troops to fight the battles of Germany. Yet how zealous ſoever the legiſlature might be in promoting this inſtitution, and notwithſtanding the ſucceſs with which many patriots exerted their endeavours through different parts of the kingdom in raiſing and diſciplining the militia, it was found not only difficult, but almoſt impracticable to execute the intention of the parliament in ſome particular counties, where the gentlemen were indolent and enervated, or in thoſe places where they looked upon their commander with contempt. Even Middleſex itſelf, where the king reſides, was one of the laſt counties in which the militia could be arrayed. In alluſion to this backwardneſs, the preamble or firſt clauſe in one of the preſent acts imported, that certain counties, ridings, and places in England had made ſome progreſs in eſtabliſhing the militia, without completing the ſame, and that in certain other counties little progreſs had been made therein, his majeſty's lieutenants and the deputy lieutenants, and all others within ſuch counties or diſtricts, were therefore ſtrictly required ſpeedily and diligently to put theſe acts in execution. The truth is, ſome of theſe unwarlike commanders failed through ignorance and inactivity; others gave or offered commiſſions to ſuch people as threw a ridicule and contempt upon the whole eſtabliſhment, and conſequently hindered many gentlemen of worth, ſpirit, and capacity from engaging in the ſervice. The mutiny-bill, and that for the regulation of the marine-forces while on ſhore, paſſed through the uſual forms, as annual meaſures, without any diſpute or alteration. [z]

A committee having been appointed to enquire what laws were expired, or near expiring, and to report their opinion to the houſe touching the revival or continuation of theſe laws, they agreed to ſeveral reſolutions; in conſequence of which the following bills were brought in, and enacted into laws; namely, an act for regulating the laſtage and ballaſtage of the river Thames; an act for continuing the law relating to the puniſhment of perſons going armed or diſguiſed; an act for continuing ſeveral laws near expiring; an act concerning the admeaſurement of coals, and an act for the relief of debtors, with reſpect to the impriſonment of their perſons. This laſt was almoſt totally metamorphoſed by alterations, amendments and additions, among which the moſt remarkable were theſe: that where more creditors than one ſhall charge any priſoner in execution, and deſire to have him detained in priſon, they ſhall only reſpectively pay him each ſuch weekly ſum, not exceeding 1s. 6d. per week, as the court, at the time of his being remanded, ſhall direct: that if any priſoner, deſcribed by the act, ſhall remain in priſon three months after being committed, any creditor may compel him to give into court, upon oath, an account of his real and perſonal eſtate, to be diſpoſed of for the benefit of his creditors, they conſenting to his being diſcharged. Why the humanity of this law was confined to thoſe priſoners only who are not charged in execution with any debt exceeding 100l. cannot eaſily be conceived. A man, who, through unavoidable misfortunes, hath ſunk from affluence to miſery and indigence, is generally a greater object of compaſſion than he who never knew the delicacies of life, nor ever enjoyed credit ſufficient to contract debts to any conſiderable amount: yet the latter is by this law entitled to his diſcharge, or at leaſt to a maintenance in priſon; while the former is left to ſtarve in gaol, or undergo perpetual impriſonment, amidſt all the horrors of miſery, if he owes above 100l. to a revengeful and unrelenting creditor. Wherefore, in a country, the people of which juſtly pique themſelves upon charity and benevolence, an unhappy fellow-citizen, reduced to a ſtate of bankruptcy by unforeſeen loſſes in trade, ſhould be ſubjected to a puniſhment, which, of all others, muſt be the moſt grievous to a free-born Briton, namely, the entire loſs of liberty; a puniſhment which the moſt flagrant crime can hardly deſerve, in a nation that diſclaims the torture; for, doubtleſs, perpetual impriſonment muſt be a torture infinitely more ſevere than death, becauſe protracted through a ſeries of years ſpent in miſery and deſpair, without one glimmering ray of hope, without the moſt diſtant proſpect of deliverance? Wherefore the legiſlature ſhould extend its humanity to thoſe only who are the leaſt ſenſible of the benefit, becauſe the moſt able to ſtruggle under misfortune; and wherefore many valuable individuals ſhould, for no guilt of their own, be not only ruined to themſelves, but loſt to the community? are queſtions which we cannot reſolve to the ſatisfaction of the reader. Of all impriſoned debtors, thoſe who are confined for large ſums may be deemed the moſt wretched and forlorn, becauſe they have generally fallen from a ſphere of life where they had little acquaintance with neceſſity and were altogether ignorant of the arts by which the ſeverities of indigence are alleviated. On the other hand, thoſe of the lower claſs of mankind, whoſe debts are ſmall in proportion to the narrowneſs of their former credit, have not the ſame delicate feelings of calamity. They are inured to hardſhip, and accuſtomed to the labour of their hands, by which, even in a priſon, they can earn a ſubſiſtence. Their reverſe of fortune is not ſo great, nor the tranſition ſo affecting. Their ſenſations are not delicate; nor are they, like their betters in misfortune, cut off from hope, which is the wretch's laſt comfort. It is the man of ſentiment and ſenſibility, who, in this ſituation, is overwhelmed with a complication of miſery and ineffable diſtreſs. The mortification of his pride, his ambition blaſted, his family undone, himſelf deprived of liberty, reduced from opulence to extreme want, from the elegancies of life to the moſt ſqualid and frightful ſcenes of poverty and affliction; diveſted of comfort, deſtitute of hope, and doomed to linger out a wretched being in the midſt of inſult, violence, riot, and uproar: theſe are reflections ſo replete with horror, as to render him in all reſpects, the moſt miſerable object on the face of the earth. He, alas! though poſſeſſed of talents that might have eſſentially ſerved, and even adorned ſociety, while thus reſtrained in priſon, and affected in mind, can exert no faculty, nor ſtoop to any condeſcenſion, by which the horrors of his fate might be aſſuaged. He ſcorns to execute the loweſt offices of menial ſervices, particularly in attending thoſe who are the objects of contempt or abhorrence: he is incapable of exerciſing any mechanic art, which might afford a happy though a ſcanty independence. Shrunk within his diſmal cell, ſurrounded by haggard poverty, and her gaunt attendants, hollow eyed famine, ſhivering cold, and wan diſeaſe, he wildly caſts his eyes around; he ſees the tender partner of his heart weeping in ſilent woe; he hears his helpleſs babes clamorous for ſuſtenance; he feels himſelf the importunate cravings of human nature, which he cannot ſatisfy; and groans with all the complicated pangs of internal anguiſh, horror, and deſpair. Theſe are not the fictions of idle fancy, but real pictures, drawn from nature, of which almoſt every priſon in England will afford but too many orignals.

Among other new meaſures, a ſucceſsful attempt was made in favour of Ireland, by a bill, permitting the free importation of cattle from that kingdom for a limited time. This, however, was not carried through both houſes without conſiderable oppoſition, ariſing from the particular intereſts of certain counties and diſtricts in ſeveral parts of Great-Britain, from whence petitions againſt the bill were tranſmitted to the commons. Divers artifices were alſo uſed within doors to ſaddle the bill with ſuch clauſes as might overcharge the ſcheme, and render it odious or alarming to the public: but the promoters of it being aware of the deſign, conducted it in ſuch a manner as to fruſtrate all their views, and convey it ſafely to the throne, where it was enacted into a law. The like ſucceſs attended another effort in behalf of our fellow-ſubjects of Ireland. The bill for the importation of Iriſh cattle was no ſooner ordered to be brought in, than the houſe proceeded to take into conſideration the duties then payable on the importation of tallow from the ſame kingdom, and ſeveral witneſſes being examined, the committee agreed to a reſolution that theſe duties ſhould ceaſe and determine for a limited time. A bill being formed accordingly, paſſed through both houſes without oppoſition; though in the preceding ſeſſion a bill to the ſame purpoſe had miſcarried among the peers: a miſcarriage probably owing to their being unacquainted with the ſentiments of his majeſty, as ſome of the duties upon tallow conſtituted part of one of the branches appropriated for the civil liſt revenue. This objection, however, was obviated in the caſe of the preſent bill, by the king's meſſage to the houſe of commons, ſignifying his majeſty's conſent, as far as his intereſt was concerned in the affair. By this new act the free importation of Iriſh tallow was permitted for the term of five years.

In the month of February the commons preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, requeſting that he would give direc-

[z] The next bill that fell under the cognizance of the houſe related to a law tranſaction, and was ſuggeſted by a petition preſented in the name of the ſheriffs, and grantees of poſt-fines under the crown of England. They enumerated and explained the difficulties under which they laboured, in raiſing and collecting theſe fines within the reſpective counties; particularly when the eſtate conveyed by fine was no more than a right of reverſion, in which caſe they could not poſſibly levy the poſt-fine, unleſs the purchaſer ſhould obtain poſſeſſion within the term of the ſheriffalty, or pay it of his own free will, as they could not diſtrain while the lands were in the poſſeſſion of the donee. They, therefore, propoſed a method for raiſing theſe poſt-fines by a proper officer, to be appointed for that purpoſe; and prayed that leave might be given to bring in a bill accordingly. This petition was ſeconded by a meſſage from the king, importing, that his majeſty, as far as his intereſt was concerned, gave his conſent that the houſe might act in this affair as they ſhould think proper.

The commons, in a committee of the whole houſe, having taken into conſideration the merits of the petition, formed ſeveral reſolutions; upon which a bill was founded for the more regular and eaſy collecting, accounting for, and paying of poſt-fines, which ſhould be due to the crown, or to the grantees thereof under the crown, and for the eaſe of the ſheriffs, in reſpect to the ſame. Before it paſſed into a law, however, it was oppoſed by a petition in favour of one William Daw, a lunatic, clerk of the king's ſilver office, alledging, that ſhould the bill paſs, it would deprive the ſaid Daw and his ſucceſſors of an ancient fee belonging to his office, on ſearches made for poſt-fines by the under-ſheriffs of the ſeveral counties; therefore, praying that ſuch proviſion might be made for the ſaid lunatic as to the houſe ſhould ſeem juſt and reaſonable. This, and divers other petitions reſpecting the bill, being diſcuſſed in the committee, it underwent ſeveral amendments, and was enacted into a law; the particulars of which cannot be properly underſtood without a previous explanation of this method of conveying eſtates: a ſubject obſcure in itſelf, founded upon a ſeeming ſubterfuge of law, ſcarce reconcileable with the dictates of common ſenſe, and conſequently improper for the pen of an hiſtorian.

tions for laying before the houſe an account of what had been done, ſince the beginning of laſt year, towards ſecuring the harbour of Milford, in purſuance of any directions from his majeſty. Theſe accounts being peruſed, and the king having, by the chancellor of the exchequer, exhorted them to make proviſion for fortifying the ſaid harbour, a bill was brought in to explain, amend, and render more effectual, the act of the laſt ſeſſion relating to this ſubject; and, paſſing through both houſes, received the royal aſſent without oppoſition. By this act ſeveral engineers were added to the commiſſioners formerly appointed; and it was ordained that fortifications ſhould be erected at Peter-church-point, Weſtlanyon-point, and Neyland-point, as being the moſt proper and beſt ſituated places for fortifying the interior parts of the harbour. It was alſo enacted that the commiſſioners ſhould appoint proper ſecretaries, clerks, aſſiſtants, and other officers, for carrying the two acts into execution; and that an account of the application of the money ſhould be laid before parliament, within twenty days of the opening of every ſeſſion. What next attracted the attention of the houſe was an affair of the utmoſt importance to the commerce of the kingdom, which equally affected the intereſt of the nation, and the character of the natives. In the latter end of February complaint was made to the houſe, that, ſince the commencement of the war, an infamous traffic had been ſet on foot by ſome merchants of London, of importing French cloths into ſeveral ports of the Levant, on account of Britiſh ſubjects. Five perſons were ſummoned to attend the houſe, and the fact was fully proved, not only by their evidence, but alſo by ſome papers ſubmitted to the houſe by the Turkey company. A bill was immediately contrived for putting a ſtop to this ſcandalous practice, reciting in the preamble, that ſuch traffic was not only a manifeſt diſcouragement and prejudice to the woolen manufactures of Great-Britain, but alſo a relief to the enemy, in conſequence of which they were enabled to maintain the war againſt theſe kingdoms.

The next object that employed the attention of the commons was to explain and amend a law made in the laſt ſeſſion for granting to his majeſty ſeveral rates and duties upon offices and penſions. The directions ſpecified in the former act for levying this impoſition having been found inconvenient in many reſpects, new regulations were now eſtabliſhed, importing that thoſe deductions ſhould be paid into the hands of receivers appointed by the king for that purpoſe; that all ſums deducted under this act ſhould be accounted for to ſuch receivers, and the accounts audited and paſſed by them, and not by the auditors of the impreſts, or of the exchequer; that all diſputes relating to the collection of this duty ſhould be finally, and in a ſummary way, determined by the barons of the exchequer in England and Scotland reſpectively; that the commiſſioners of the land-tax ſhould fix and aſcertain the ſum total or amount of the perquiſites of every office and employment within their reſpective diſtricts, diſtinct from the ſalary thereunto belonging, to be deducted under the ſaid act, independently of any former valuation or aſſeſſment of the ſame to the land-tax; and ſhould rate or aſſeſs all offices and employments, the perquiſites whereof ſhould be found to exceed the ſum of 100l. per annum, at one ſhilling for every twenty thence ariſing; that the receivers ſhould tranſmit to the commiſſioners in every diſtrict where any office or employment is to be aſſeſſed, an account of ſuch offices and employments, that upon being certified of the truth of their amount they might be rated and aſſeſſed accordingly; that in all future aſſeſſments of the land-tax the ſaid offices and employments ſhould not be valued at higher rates than thoſe at which they were aſſeſſed towards the land-tax of the 31ſt year of the preſent reign; that the word perquiſite ſhould be underſtood to mean ſuch profits of offices and employments as ariſe from fees eſtabliſhed by cuſtom or authority, and payable either by the crown or the ſubjects, in conſideration of buſineſs done in the courſe of executing ſuch offices and employments; and that a commiſſioner poſſeſſed of any office or employment might not interfere in the execution of the ſaid act, except in what might relate to his own employment. By the four laſt clauſes ſeveral ſalaries were exempted from the payment of this duty. The objections made without doors to this new law were the acceſſion of pecuniary influence to the crown, by the creation of a new office and officers, whereas this duty might have been eaſily collected and received by the commiſſioners of the land-tax already appointed, and the inconſiſtency that appeared between the 5th and 7th clauſes: in the former of theſe, the commiſſioners of the land-tax were veſted with the power of aſſeſſing the perquiſites of every office within their reſpective diſtricts, independent of any former valuation or aſſeſſment of the ſame to the land-tax; and by the latter, they are reſtricted from aſſeſſing any office at a higher rate than that of the 31ſt year of the reign of George II.

In the beginning of March petitions were offered to the houſe by the merchants of Birmingham, in Warwickſhire, and Sheffield, in Yorkſhire, ſpecifying that the toy trade of theſe and many other towns conſiſted generally of articles in which gold and ſilver might be ſaid to be manufactured, though in ſmall propotion, inaſmuch as the ſale of them depend upon ſlight ornaments of gold and ſilver: that by a clauſe paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, obliging every perſon who ſhould ſell goods or wares in which gold or ſilver was manufactured, to take out an annual licence of 40s. they the petitioners were laid under great difficulties and diſadvantages: that not only the firſt ſeller, but every perſon through whoſe hands the goods or wares paſſed to the conſumer, was required to take out the ſaid licence; they, therefore, requeſted that the houſe would take theſe hardſhips and inequalities into conſideration, and indulge them with reaſonable relief. The committee, to which this affair was referred, having reſolved that this impoſition was found detrimental to the toy and and cutlery trade of the kingdom, the houſe agreed to the reſolution, and a bill being prepared, under the title of 'an act to amend the act made in the laſt ſeſſion, for repealing the duty granted by an act of the 6th year of the reign of his late majeſty on ſilver plate, and for granting a duty on licences to be taken out by all perſons dealing in gold and ſilver plate,' was enacted into a law by the royal function. By this new regulation, ſmall quantities of gold and ſilver plate were allowed to be ſold without licence. Inſtead of the duty before payable upon licences, another was granted to be taken out by certain dealers in gold and ſilver plate, pawnbrokers, and refiners. This affair being diſcuſſed, the houſe took into conſideration the claims of the propietors of lands purchaſed for the better ſecuring of his majeſty's docs, ſhips, and ſtores at Chatham, Portſmouth, and Plymouth; and for better fortifying the town of Portſmouth, and citadel of Plymouth, in purſuance of an act paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion. We have already ſpecified the ſum granted for this purpoſe, in conſequence of a reſolution of the houſe, upon which a bill being founded, ſoon paſſed into a law, without oppoſition.[a]

In the month of April, a bill was brought in for the more effectual preventing the fraudulent importation of cambricks; and while it was under deliberation, ſeveral merchants and wholeſale drapers of the city of London preſented a petition, repreſenting the grievances to which they, and many thouſands of other traders, would be ſubjected, ſhould the bill, as it then ſtood, be paſſed into a law Accordingly to their requeſt, they were heard by their counſel on the merits of this remonſtrance, and ſome amendments were made to the bill in their favour. At length it received the royal aſſent, and became a law to the following effect: It enacted, that no cambricks, French lawns, or linens of this kind uſually entered under the denomination of cambricks, ſhould be imported after the 1ſt day of Auguſt, but in bales, caſes, or boxes, covered with ſackcloth or canvas, containing each 100 whole pieces, or 200 half pieces, on penalty of forfeiting the whole: that cambricks and French lawns ſhould be imported for exportation only, lodged in the king's warehouſe, and delivered out under like ſecurity and reſtrictions as prohibited Eaſt-India merchandiſe; and, on importation, pay only the half ſubſidy: that all cambricks and French lawns in the cuſtody of any perſons ſhould be depoſited, by the 1ſt of Auguſt, in the king's warehouſes, the bonds thereupon be delivered up, and the drawbac on the exportation paid; yet the goods ſhould not be delivered out again but for exportation: that cambricks and French lawns expoſed to ſale, or found in the poſſeſſion of private perſons, after the ſaid day, ſhould be forfeited, and liable to be ſearched for, and ſeized, in like manner as other prohibited and un-cuſtomed goods are; and the offender ſhall forfeit 200l. over and above all other penalties and forfeitures inflicted by any former act: that if any doubt ſhould ariſe concerning the ſpecies or quality of the goods, or the place where they were manufactured, the proof ſhould lie on the owner: finally, that the penaly of 5l. inflicted by a former act, and payable to the informer, on any perſon that ſhould wear any cambrick or French lawns, ſhould ſtill remain in force, and be recoverable, on conviction, by oath of one witneſs, before one juſtice of the peace.—The laſt ſucceſsful bill which this ſeſſion produced was that relating to the augmentation of the ſalaries of the judges in his majeſty's ſuperior courts of juſtice. A motion having been made for an inſtruction to the committee of ſupply, to conſider of the ſaid augmentation, the chancellor of the exchequer acquainted the houſe that this augmentation was recommended to them by his majeſty. Nevertheleſs, the motion was oppoſed, and a warm debate enſued. At length, however, being carried in the affirmative, the committee agreed to certain reſolutions, on which a bill was founded. While it remained under diſcuſſion, a motion was made for an inſtruction to the committee, that they ſhould have power to receive a clauſe or clauſes for reſtraining the judges, comprehended within the proviſions of the bill, from receiving any fee, gift, preſent, or entertainment from any city, town, borough, or corporation, or from any ſheriff, jailer, or other officer, upon their ſeveral reſpective circuits, and from taking any gratuity from any office or officer of any of the courts of law. Another motion was made, for a clauſe reſtraining ſuch judges, barons, and juſtices, as were comprehended within the proviſions of the bill, from interfering, otherwiſe than by giving their own votes, in any election of members to ſerve in parliament; but both theſe propoſals, being put to the vote, were carried in the negative. Theſe two motions being over-ruled by the majority, the bill underwent ſome amendments; and, having paſſed through both houſes in the ordinary courſe, was enacted into a law by the royal ſanction. With reſpect to the import of this act, it is no other than the eſtabliſhment of the ſeveral ſtamp-duties, applied to the augmentation; and the appropriation of their produce in ſuch a manner, that the crown cannot alter the application of the ſums thus granted in parliament. But, on this occaſion, no attempt was made in favour of the independency of the the judges, which ſeems to have been invaded by a late interpretation of, or rather by a deviation from, the act of ſettlement; in which it is expreſly ordained, that the commiſſions of the judges ſhould continue in force quam diu ſe bene geſſerint; that their ſalaries ſhould be fixed, and none of them removeable but by an addreſs of both houſes of parliament. It was then, without all doubt, the intention of the legiſlature that every judge ſhould enjoy his office during life, unleſs convicted by legal trial of ſome miſbehaviour, or unleſs both houſes of parliament ſhould concur in deſiring his removal: but the doctrine now adopted imports, that no commiſſion can continue in force longer than the life of the king by whom it was granted; that therefore the commiſſions of the judges muſt be renewed by a new king at his acceſſion, who ſhould have it in his power to employ either thoſe whom he finds acting as judges at his acceſſion, or confer their offices on orhers, with no other reſtraint than that the condition of the new commiſſions ſhould be quam diu ſe bene geſſerint. Thus the office of a judge is rendered more precarious, and the influence of the crown receives a conſiderable re-enforcement.

[a] The next bill which was brought into the houſe related to the ſummons iſſued by the commiſſioners of the exciſe, and juſtices of the peace, for the appearance of perſons offending againſt, or for forfeitures incurred by the laws of exciſe. As ſome doubts had ariſen with reſpect to the method of ſummoning in ſuch caſes, this bill, which obtained the royal aſſent in due courſe, enacted, that the ſummons left at the houſe, or uſual place of reſidence, or with the wife, child, or menial ſervants of the perſon ſo ſummoned ſhould be held as legal notice, as well as the leaving ſuch notice at the houſe, workhouſe, warehouſe, ſhop, cellar, vault, or uſual place of reſidence of ſuch perſon, directed to him by his right or aſſumed name; and all dealers in coffee, tea, or chocolate were ſubjected to the penalty of twenty pounds as often as they ſhould neglect to attend the commiſſioners of exciſe, when ſummoned in this manner.

Among the bills that miſcarried in the courſe of this ſeſſion, we may number a ſecond attempt to carry into execution the ſcheme which was offered laſt year for the more effectual manning the navy, preventing deſertion, and relieving and encouraging the ſeamen of Great-Britain. A bill was accordingly brought in, couched in nearly the ſame terms which had been rejected in the laſt ſeſſion; and it was ſupported by a conſiderable number of members, animated with a true ſpirit of patriotiſm: but to the trading part of the nation it appeared one of thoſe plauſible projects, which, though agreeable in ſpeculation, can never be reduced into practice without a concomitancy of greater evils than thoſe they were intended to remove. While the bill remained under the conſideration of the houſe, petitions were preſented againſt it by the merchants of Briſtol, Scarborough, Whitby, Kingſton-upon-Hull, and Lancaſter, repreſenting, That, by ſuch a law, the trade of the kingdom, which is the nurſery and ſupport of ſeamen at all times, and that ſpirit of equipping private ſhips of war, which had been of diſtinguiſhed ſervice to the nation, would be laid under ſuch difficulties as might cauſe a great ſtagnation in the former, and a total ſuppreſſion of the latter; the bill, therefore, would be highly prejudicial to the marine of the kingdom, and altogether ineffectual for the purpoſes intended. A great number of books and papers, relating to trading ſhips and veſſels as well as to ſeamen, and other perſons protected or preſſed into the navy, and to expences occaſioned by preſſing men into the navy, were examined in a committee of the whole houſe, and the bill was improved with many amendments: nay, after, it was printed and engroſſed, ſeveral clauſes were added by way of rider; yet ſtill the experiment ſeemed dangerous. The motion for its being paſſed was violently oppoſed; warm debates enſued; they were adjourned, and reſumed; and the arguments againſt the bill appeared at length in ſuch a ſtriking light, that, when the queſtion was put, the majority declared for the negative. The regulations which had been made in parliament during the 26th, the 28th, and 30th years of the preſent reign, for the preſervation of the public roads, being attended with ſome inconveniencies in certain parts of the kingdom, petitions were brought from ſome counties in Wales, as well as from the freeholders of Herefordſhire, the farmers of Middleſex, and others enumerating the difficulties attending the uſe of broad wheels in one caſe, and the limitation of horſes uſed in drawing carriages with narrow wheels in the other. The matter of theſe remonſtrances was conſidered in a committee of the whole houſe, which reſolved that the weight to be carried by all waggons and carts travelling on the turnpike roads ſhould be limited. On this reſolution a bill was framed, for amending and reducing into one act of parliament the three acts before mentioned for the preſervation of the public highways: but ſome objections being ſtarted, and a petition interpoſed by the land-owners of Suffolk and Norfolk, alledging that the bill, if paſſed into a law, would render it impoſſible to bring freſh proviſions from thoſe counties to London, as the ſupply depended abſolutely upon the quickneſs of conveyance, the further conſideration of it was poſtponed to a longer day, and never reſumed in the ſequel: ſo that the attempt miſcarried.

Of all the ſubjects which, in the courſe of this ſeſſion, fell under the cognizance of parliament, there was none that more intereſted the humanity or challenged the redreſs of the legiſlature than did the caſe of the poor inſolvent debtors, who languiſhed under all the miſeries of indigence and impriſonment. In the month of February a petition was offered to the commons in behalf of bankrupts, who repreſented, that having ſcrupulouſly conformed to the laws made concerning bankruptcy, by ſurrendering their all upon oath for the benefit of their creditors, they had nevertheleſs been refuſed their certificates, without any probability of relief; that by this cruel refuſal, many bankrupts have been obliged to abſcond, while others were immured in priſon, and theſe unhappy ſufferers groaned under the particular hardſhip of being excluded from the benefit of laws occaſionally made for the relief of inſolvent debtors; that the power veſted in creditors of refuſing certificates to their bankrupts was, as the petitioners conceived, founded upon a preſumption that ſuch power would be tenderly exerciſed, and never but in notorious caſes; but the great increaſe in the number of bankrupts within two years paſt, and the ſmall proportion of thoſe who had been able to obtain their certificates, ſeemed to demonſtrate that the power had been uſed for cruel and unjuſt purpoſes, contrary to the intention of the legiſlature: that as the greater part of the petitioners, and their fellow-ſufferers, muſt inevitably and ſpeedily periſh, with their diſtreſſed families, unleſs ſeaſonably relieved by the interpoſition of parliament, they implored the compaſſion of the houſe, from which they hoped immediate favour and relief. This petition was accompanied with a printed caſe, explaining the nature of the laws relating to bankrupts, and pointing out their defects in point of policy as well as humanity; but little regard was ſeemingly paid to either remonſtrance. Other petitions, however, being preſented by inſolvent debtors impriſoned in different gaols within the kingdom, leave was given to bring in a bill for their relief, and a committee appointed to examine the laws relating to bankruptcy.

Among other petitionary remonſtrances on this ſubject, the members were ſeparately preſented with the printed caſe of captain George Walker, a priſoner in the gaol of the King's-Bench, who had been declared a bankrupt, and complained, that he had been ſubjected to ſome flagrant acts of injuſtice and oppreſſion. The caſe contained ſuch extraordinary allegations, and the captain's character was ſo remarkably fair and intereſting, that the committee, which were empowered to ſend for perſons, papers, and records, resolved to enquire into the particulars of his misfortune. A motion was made and agreed to, that the marshal of the prison should bring the captain before the committee, and the speaker's warrant was issued accordingly. The prisoner was produced, and examined at several sittings; and some of the members expressed a laudable eagerness to do him justice: but his antagonists were very powerful, and left no stone unturned to frustrate the purpose of the enquiry, which was dropped of course at the end of the session. Thus the unfortunate captain Walker, who had, in the late war, remarkably distinguished himself at sea by his courage and conduct, repeatedly signalised himself against the enemies of his country, was sent bac, without redress, to the gloomy mansions of a gaol, where he had already pined for several years, useless to himself, and lost to the community, while he might have been profitably employed in retrieving his own fortune, and exerting his talents for the general advantage of the nation. While this affair was in agitation, the bill for the relief of insolvent debtors was prepared, printed, and read a second time; but, when the motion was made for its being committed, a debate arose, and this was adjourned from time to time till the end of the session. In the mean time, the committee continued to deliberate upon the laws relating to bankruptcy; and in the beginning of June reported their resolution to the house, that, in their opinion, some amendments might be made to the laws concerning bankruptcy; to the advantage of creditors, and relief of insolvents. Such was the notice vouchsafed to the cries of many British subjects, deprived of liberty, and destitute of the common necessaries of life.

It would engage us in a long digressive discussion, were we to enquire how the spirit of the laws in England, so famed for lenity, has been exasperated into such severity against insolvent debtors; and why, among a people so distinguished for generosity and compassion, the gaols should be more filled with prisoners than they are in any other part of Christendom. Perhaps both these deviations from a general character are violent efforts of a wary legislature made in behalf of trade, which cannot be too much cherished in a nation that principally depends upon commerce. The question is, whether this laudable aim may not be more effectually accomplished, without subjecting individuals to oppression, arising from the cruelty and revenge of one another. As the laws are modelled at present, it cannot he denied that the debtor, in some cases, lies in a peculiar manner at the mercy of his creditor. By the original and common law of England, no man could be imprisoned for debt. The plaintiff in any civil action could have no execution upon his judgement against either the body or the lands of the defendant: even with respect to his goods and chattels, which were subject to execution, he was obliged to leave him such articles as were necessary for agriculture. But, in process of time, this indulgence being found prejudicial to commerce, a law was enacted, in the reign of Edward I. allowing execution on the person of the debtor, provided his goods and chattels were not sufficient to pay the debt which he had contracted. This law was still attended with a very obvious inconvenience. The debtor who possessed an estate in lands was tempted to secret his moveable effects, and live in concealment on the produce of his lands, while the sheriff connived at his retirement. To remove this evil, a second statute was enacted in the same reign, granting immediate execution against the body, lands, and goods of the debtor; yet his effects could not be sold for the benefit of his creditor till the expiration of three months, during which he himself could dispose of them for ready money, in order to discharge his incumberances. If the creditor was not satisfied in this manner, he continued in possession of the debtor's lands, and detained the debtor himself in prison, where he was obliged to supply him with bread and water for his support, until the debt was discharged. Other severe regulations were made in the sequel, particularly in the reign of Edward III. which gave rise to the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum. This, indeed, rendered the preceding laws, called statute-merchant, and statute-staple, altogether unnecessary. Though the liberty of the subject, and the security of the landholder, were thus, in some measure, sacrificed to the advantage of commerce, an imprisoned debtor was not left entirely at the mercy of an inexorable creditor. If he made all the satisfaction in his power, and could show that his insolvency was owing to real misfortunes, the court of chancery interposed on his petition, and actually ordered him to be discharged from prison, when no good reason for detaining him could be assigned. This interposition, which seems naturally to belong to a court of equity, constituted with a view to mitigate the rigour of the common law, ceased, in all probability, after the restoration of Charles II. and of consequence the prisons were filled with debtors. Then the legislature charged themselves with the extension of a power, which perhaps a chancellor no longer thought himself safe in exercising; and in the year 1670, passed the first act for the relief of insolvent debtors, granting a release to all prisoners for debt, without distinction or enquiry. By this general indulgence, which has even in a great measure continued in all subsequent acts of the same kind, the lenity of the parliament may be sometimes misapplied, inasmuch as insolvency is often criminal, arising from profligacy and extravagance, which deserve to be severely punished. Yet, even for this species of insolvency, perpetual imprisonment, aggravated by the miseries of extreme indigence, and the danger of perishing through famine, may be deemed a punishment too severe. How cruel then must it be to leave the most innocent bankrupt exposed to this punishment, from the revenge or sinister design of a merciless creditor; a creditor, by whose fraud perhaps the prisoner became a bankrupt, and by whose craft he is detained in gaol; left, by his discharge from prison, he should be enabled to seek that redress in chancery to which he is entitled on a fair account! The severity of the law was certainly intended against fraudulent bankrupts only; and the statute of bankruptcy is, doubtless, favourable to insolvents, as it discharges from all former debts those who obtain their certificates. As British subjects, they are surely entitled to the same indulgence which is granted to other insolvents. They were always included in every act passed for the relief of insolvent debtors, till the 6th year of George I. when they were first excepted from this benefit. By a law enacted in the reign of queen Anne, relating to bankruptcy, any creditor was at liberty to object to the confirmation of the bankrupt's certificate; but the chancellor had power to judge whether the objection was frivolous or well founded: yet, by a later act, the chancellor is obliged to confirm the certificate, if it is agreeable to four-fifths in number and value of the creditors; whereas he cannot confirm it, should he be opposed, even without any reason assigned, by one creditor to whom the greatest part of the debt is owing. It might, therefore, deserve the consideration of parliament, whether, in extending their clemency to the poor, it should not be equally diffused to bankrupts and other insolvents; whether proper distinction ought not to be made between the innocent bankrupt who fails through misfortunes in trade, and him who becomes insolvent from fraud or profligacy: and finally, whether the enquiry and trial of all such cases would not properly fall within the province of chancery, a tribunal instituted for the mitigation of common law.

The house of commons seems to have been determined on another measure, which, however, does not admit of explanation. An order was made in the month of February, that leave should be given to bring in a bill to explain, amend, and render effectual so much of an act, passed in the thirteenth year of George II. against the excessive increase of horse-races, and deceitful gaming, as related to that increase. The bill was accordingly presented, read, printed, and ordered to be committed to a committee of the whole house; but the order was delayed from time to time till the end of the session. Some progress was likewise made in another affair of greater consequence to the community. A committee was appointed in the month of March, to take into consideration the state of the poor in England, as well as the laws enacted for their maintenance. The clerks of the peace belonging to all the counties, cities, and towns in England and Wales, were ordered to transmit, for the perusal of the house, an account of the annual expence of passing vagrants through their respective divisions and districts for four years: and the committee began to deliberate on this important subject. In the latter end of May the house was made acquainted with their resolutions, importing, that the present method of relieving the poor in the respective parishes, where no workhouses have been provided for their reception and employment, are, in general, very burthensome to the inhabitants, and tend to render the poor miserable to themselves, and useless to the community: that the present method of giving money out of the parochial rates to persons capable of labour, in order to prevent them from claiming an entire subsistence for themselves and their families, is contrary to the spirit and intention of the laws for the relief of the poor, is a dangerous power in the hands of parochial officers, a misapplication of the public money, and a great encouragement to idleness and intemperance: that the employment of the poor, under proper direction and management, in such works and manufactures as are suited to their respective capacities, would be of great utility to the public: that settling the poor in workhouses, to be provided in the several counties and ridings in England and Wales, under the direction and management of governors and trustees to be appointed for that purpose, would be the most effectual method of relieving such poor persons, as, by age, infirmities, or diseases, are rendered incapable of supporting themselves by their labour; of employing the able and industrious, reforming the idle and profligate, and of educating poor children in religion and industry: that the poor in such workhouses would be better regulated and maintained, and managed with more advantage to the public, by guardians, governors, or trustees, to be specially appointed, or chosen for that purpose, and incorporated with such powers, and under such restrictions, as the legislature should deem proper, than by the annual parochial officers: that erecting workhouses upon waste lands, and appropriating a certain quantity of such lands to be cultivated, in order to produce provision for the poor in the said houses, would not only be a means of instructing and employing many of the said poor in agriculture, but lessen the expence of the public: that controversies and law-suits concerning the settlements of poor persons occasioned a very great, and, in general, an useless expence to the public, amounting to many thousand pounds per annum; and that often more money is expended in ascertaining such settlements, by each of the contending parishes, than would be sufficient to maintain the paupers: that should workhouses be established for the general reception of the poor, in the respective counties and ridings of England, the laws relating to the settlements of the poor, and the passing of vagrants, might be repealed: that while the present laws relating to the poor subsist, the compelling parish-officers to grant certificates to the poor would, in all probability, prevent the hardships they now suffer, in being debarred gaining their livelihood, where they can do it most usefully to themselves and the public. From these sensible resolutions, the reader may conceive some idea of the misconduct that attends the management of the poor in England, as well as of the grievous burthens entailed upon the people by the present laws which constitute this branch of the legislature. The committee's resolves being read at the table, an order was made that they should be taken into consideration on a certain day, when the order was again put off, and in the interim the parliament was prorogued. While the committee deliberated upon this affair, leave was given to prepare a bill for preventing tenants under a certain yearly rent from gaining settlements in any particular parish, by being there rated in any land-tax assessment, and paying for the landlord the money so charged. This order was afterwards discharged; and another bill brought in, to prevent any person from gaining a settlement, by being rated by virtue of an act of parliament for granting any aid to his majesty by a land-tax, and paying the same. The bill was accordingly presented, read, committed, and passed the lower-house; but among the lords it miscarried. It can never be expected that the poor will be managed with œconomy and integrity, while the execution of the laws relating to their maintenance is left in the hands of low tradesmen, who derive private advantage from supplying them with necessaries, and often favour the imposition of one another with the most scandalous collusion. This is an evil which will never be remedied, until persons of independent fortune, and unblemished integrity, actuated by a spirit of true patriotism, shall rescue their fellow-citizens from the power of such interested miscreants, by taking the poor into their own management and protection. Instead of multiplying laws with respect to the settlement and management of the poor, which serve only to puzzle and perplex the parish and peace officers, it would become the sagacity of the legislature to take some effectual precautions to prevent the increase of paupers and vagrants, which is become an intolerable nuisance to the common-wealth. Towards this salutary end, surely nothing would more contribute than a reformation of the police, that would abolish those infamous places of entertainment, which swarm in every corner of the metropolis, seducing people of all ranks to extravagance, profligacy, and ruin; that would restrict within due bounds the number of public-houses, which are augmented to an enormous degree, affording so many asylums for riot and debauchery, and corrupting the morals of the common people to such a pitch of licentious indecency, as must be a reproach to every civilized nation. Let it not be affirmed, to the disgrace of Great-Britain, that such receptacles of vice and impunity subsist under the connivance of the government, according to the narrow views and confined speculation of those shallow politicians, who imagine that the revenue is increased in proportion to the quantity of strong liquors consumed in such infamous recesses of intemperance. Were this in reality the case, that administration would deserve to be branded with eternal infamy, which could sacrifice to such a base consideration the health, the lives, and the morals of their fellow-creatures: but nothing can be more fallacious, than the supposition, that the revenue of any government can be increased by the augmented intemperance of the people; for intemperance is the bane of industry, as well as of population; and what the government gains in the articles of the duty on malt, and the excise upon liquors, will always be greatly over-balanced by the loss in other articles, arising from the diminution of hands, and the neglect of labour.

Reflections on the management of the Poor Laws.

Exclusive of the bills that were actually prepared, though they did not pass in the course of this session, the commons deliberated on other important subjects, which, however, were not finally discussed. In the beginning of the session, a committee being appointed to resume the enquiry touching the regulation of weights and measures, a subject we have mentioned in the history of the preceding session, the box which contained a Troy pound weight, locked up by order of the house, was again produced by the clerk in whose custody it had been deposited. This affair being carfully investigated, the committee agreed to fourteen resolutions [b]. In the mean time it was ordered, that all the weights referred to in the report, should be delivered to

Enquiry about weights and measures

[b] As the curiosity of the reader may be interested in these resolutions, we shall here insert them for his satisfaction. The committee resolved, that the ell ought to contain one yard and one quarter, according to the yard mentioned in the third resolution of the former committee upon the subject of weights and measures: that the pole, or perch, should contain in length five such yards and a half; the furlong 220; and the mile 1760: that the superficial perch should contain 30 square yards and a quarter: the rood 1210; and the acre 4840: that according to the fourth, fifth, and sixth resolutions of the former committee, upon the subject of weights and measures, agreed to by the house on the 2d day of June in the preceding year, the quart ought to contain 70 cubical inches and one half; the pint 35 and one quarter; the peck 564; and the bushel 2256. That the several parts of the pound, mentioned in the eighth resolution of the former committee, examined and adjusted in presence of this committee, viz. the half pound or six ounces, quarter of a pound or three ounces, two ounces, one ounce, two half ounces, the five-penny weight, three-penny weight, two-penny weight, and one-penny weight, the twelve grains, six grains, three grains, two grains, and two of one grain each, ought to be the models of the several parts of the said pound, and to be used for sizing or adjusting weights for the future. That all weights exceeding a pound should be of brass, copper, bell-metal, or cast-iron; and all those of cast-iron should be made in the form, and with a handle of hammered iron, such as the pattern herewith produced, having the mark of the weight cast in the iron; and all weights of a pound, or under, should be of gold, silver, brass, copper, or bell-metal. That all weights of cast-iron should have the initial letters of the name of the maker upon the upper bar of the handle; and all other weights should have the same, together with the mark of the weight, according to this standard, upon some convenient part thereof. That the yard, mentioned in the second resolution of the former committee, upon the subject of weights and measures, agreed to by the house in the last session, being the standard of length, and the pound, mentioned in the eighth resolution, being the standard of weight, ought to be deposited in the court of the receipt of the exchequer, and there safely kept under the seals of the chancellor of the said exchequer; and of the chief baron, and the seal of office of the chamberlain of the exchequer, and not to be opened but by the order and in the presence of the chancellor of the exchequer and chief barons for the time being. That the most effectual means to ascertain uniformity in measures of length and weight, to be used throughout the realm, would be to appoint certain persons at one particular office, with clerks and workmen under them, for the purpose only of sizing and adjusting, for the use of the subjects, all measures of length, and all weights, being parts, multiples, or certain proportions of the standards to be used for the future. That a model or pattern of the said standard yard, mentioned in the second resolution of the former committee, and now in the custody of the clerk of the house, and a model or pattern of the standard pound, mentioned in the eighth resolution of that committee, together with models or patterns of the parts of the said pound, now presented to the house, and also of the multiples of the said pound, mentioned in this report (when the same are adjusted) should be kept in the said office, in custody of the said persons to be appointed for sizing weights and measures, under the seal of the chief baron of the exchequer for the time being, to be opened only by order of the said chief baron, in his presence, or the presence of one of the barons of the exchequer, on the application of the said persons, for the purpose of correcting and adjusting, as occasion should require, the patterns or models used at the said office, for sizing measures of length and weight, delivered out to the subjects. That models or patterns of the said standard yard and standard pound aforesaid, and also models and patterns of the parts and multiples aforesaid of the said pound, should be lodged in the said office for the sizing of such measures of length or weight, as being parts, multiples, or proportions of the said standards, should hereafter be required by any of his majesty's subjects. That all measures of length and weight, sized at the said office, should be marked in some convenient part thereof with such marks as should be thought expedient, to show the identity of the measures and weights sized at the said office, and to discover any frauds that may be committed therein. That the said office should be kept within a convenient dis-the clerk of the houſe, to be locked up, and brought forth again occaſionally.

The houſe of commons, among other articles or domeſtic œconomy, beſtowed ſome attention on the hoſpital for foundlings, which was now, more than ever, become a matter of national conſideration. The accounts relating to this charity having been demanded, and ſubjected to the inſpection of the members, were, together with the king's recommendation, referred to the committee of ſupply, where they produced the reſolutions which we have already ſpecified among the other grants of the year. The houſe afterwards reſolved itſelf into a committee to deliberate on the ſtate of the hoſpital, and examine its accounts. On the 3d day of May their reſolutions were reported on the following effect: That the appointing, by the governors and guardians of the ſaid hoſpital, places in the ſeveral counties, ridings, or diviſions in this kingdom, for the firſt reception of expoſed and deſerted young children would be attended with many evil conſequences; and that the conveying of children from the country to the ſaid hoſpital is attended with many evil conſequences; and ought to be prevented. A bill was ordered to be brought in, founded upon this laſt reſolution; but never preſented, therefore the enquiry produced no effect. Notwithſtanding the inſtitution of this charity, for the ſupport of which great ſums are yearly levied on the public, it does not appear that the bills of mortality, reſpecting new-born children, are decreaſed, not the ſhocking crime of infant-murder rendered leſs frequent than heretofore. It may, therefore, be not improperly ſtiled a heavy additional tax for the propagation of baſtardy, and encouragement of idleneſs, among the common people: beſides the tendency it has to extinguiſh the feelings of the heart, and diſſolve thoſe family ties of blood by which the charities are connected.

In the month of March leave was given to bring in a bill for the more effectual preventing of the melting down and exporting the gold and ſilver coin of the kingdom, and perſons were nominated to prepare it; but the bill never appeared, and no further enquiry was made about the matter. Perhaps it was ſuppoſed that ſuch meaſures might be thought an encroachment on the prerogative of the crown, which hath always exerciſed the power of fixing the ſtandard and regulating the currency of the coin. Perhaps ſuch a ſtep was deferred on the account of the war, during which a great quantity of gold and ſilver was neceſſarily exported to the continent, for the ſupport of the allies and armies in the pay of Great-Britain. The legiſlature, however, would do well to conſider this eternal maxim in computation, that when a greater quantity of bullion is exported, in waſte, than can be replaced by commerce, the nation muſt be haſtening to a ſtate of inſolvency. Over and above theſe proceedings in this ſeſſion of parliament, it may not be unneceſſary to mention ſeveral meſſages which were ſent by the king to the houſe of commons. That relating to the vote of credit we have already ſpecified in our account of the ſupply. On the 26th day of April the chancellor of the exchequer preſented to the houſe two meſſages, ſigned by his majeſty, one in favour of his ſubjects in North-America, and the other in behalf of the Eaſt-India company: the former recommending to their conſideration the zeal and vigour with which his faithful ſubjects in North-America had exerted themſelves, in defence of his juſt rights and poſſeſſions; deſiring he might be enabled to give them a proper compenſation for the expences incurred by the reſpective provinces in levying, cloathing, and paying the troops raiſed in that country, according as the active vigour and ſtrenuous efforts of the ſeveral colonies ſhould appear to merit. In the latter, he deſired the houſe would empower him to aſſiſt the Eaſt-India company in defraying the expence of a military force in the Eaſt-Indies to be maintained by them, in lieu of a battalion of regular troops withdrawn from thence, and returned to Ireland. Both theſe meſſages were referred to a committee of ſupply, and produced the reſolutions upon each ſubject which we have already explained. The meſſage relating to a projected invaſion by the enemies of Great-Britain we ſhall particularize in its proper place, when we come to record the circumſtances and miſcarriage of that deſign. In the mean time, it may not be improper to obſerve, that the thanks of the houſe of commons were voted and given to admiral Boſcawen and major-general Amherſt for the ſervices they had done their king and country in North-America; and the ſame compliment was paid to admiral Oſborne, for the ſucceſs of his cruiſe in the Mediterranean.

The ſeſſion was cloſed on the ſecond day of June with a ſpeech to both houſes, from the commiſſioners appointed by his majeſty for that purpoſe. In this harangue the parliament was given to underſtand, that the king approved of their conduct, and returned them his thanks for their condeſcenſion; that the hopes he had conceived of their ſurmounting the difficulties which lay in the way were founded on the wiſdom, zeal, and affection of ſo good a parliament, and that his expectations were fully anſwered; that they had conſidered the war in all its parts, and notwithſtanding its long continuance, through the obſtinacy of the enemy, had made ſuch proviſion for the many different operations as ought to convince the adverſaries of Great-Britain, that it would be for their intereſt, as well as for the eaſe and relief of all Europe, to embrace equitable and honourable terms of accommodation. They were told that, by their aſſiſtance, the combined army in Germany had been completed; powerful ſquadrons, as well as numerous bodies of land-forces, were employed in America, in order to maintain the Britiſh rights and poſſeſſions, and annoy the enemy in the moſt ſenſible manner in that country: that, as France was making conſiderable preparations in her different ports, he had taken care to put his fleet at home in the beſt condition, both of ſtrength and ſituation, to guard againſt and repel any attempts that might be meditated againſt his kingdoms: that all his meaſures had been directed to aſſert the honour of his crown; to preſerve the eſſential intereſts of his faithful ſubjects; to ſupport the cauſe of the proteſtant religion, and public liberty: he, therefore, truſted that the uprightneſs of his intenſions would draw down the bleſſings of heaven upon his endeavours. He expreſſed his hope, that the precautions they had taken to prevent and correct the exceſſes of the privateers would produce the deſired effect: a conſideration which the king had much at heart; for, though ſenſible of the utility of that ſervice, when under proper regulations, he was determined to do his utmoſt to prevent any injuries or hardſhips which might be ſuſtained by the ſubjects of neutral powers, as far as might be practicable and conſiſtent with his majeſty's juſt right to hinder the trade of his enemies from being colluſively and fraudulently covered. He not only thanked the commons, but applauded the firmneſs and vigour with which they had acted, as well as their prudence in judging, that, notwithſtanding the preſent burthens, the making ample proviſion for carrying on the war was the moſt probable means to bring it to an honourable and happy concluſion. He aſſured them that no attention ſhould be wanting, on his part, for the faithful application of what had been granted. They were informed he had nothing further to deſire, but that they would carry down the ſame good diſpoſitions, and propogate them in their ſeveral counties, which they had ſhown in their proceedings during the ſeſſion. Theſe declarations being pronounced, the parliament was prorogued.

The people of England, provoked on one hand by the intrigues, the hoſtilities, and menaces of France, and animated on the other by the pride of triumph and ſucceſs, which never fails to reconcile them to difficulties, however great, and expence, however enormous, at this period breathed nothing but war, and diſcourſed about nothing but new plans of conqueſt. We have ſeen how liberally the parliament beſtowed the nation's money: and the acquieſcence of the ſubjects in general under the additional burthens which had being impoſed, appeared in the remarkable eagerneſs with which they embarked in the ſubſcription planned by the legiſlature; in the vigorous aſſiſtance they contributed towards manning the navy, recruiting the army, and levying additional forces; and the warlike ſpirit which began to diffuſe itſelf through all ranks of the people. This was a ſpirit which the miniſtry carefully ſtance of the court of exchequer at Weſtminſter; and that all meaſures of length and weight, within a certain diſtance of London, ſhould be corrected and re-aſſized, as occaſion ſhould require, at the ſaid office. That, in order to enforce the uniformity in weights and meaſures to be uſed for the future, all perſons to be appointed by the crown to act as juſtices of the peace in any county, city, or town corporate, being reſpectively counties within themſelves, throughout the realm, ſhould be empowered to hear and determine, and put the law in execution, in reſpect to weights and meaſures only, without any of them being obliged to ſue out a dedimus, or to act in any other matter, and the ſaid commiſſioners ſhould be empowered to ſue, impriſon, inflict, or mitigate ſuch penalties as ſhould be thought proper: and have ſuch other authorities as ſhould be neceſſary for compelling the uſe of weights and meaſures, agreeable to the aforeſaid ſtandard. That models or patterns of the ſaid ſtandard yard and pound, and of the parts and multiples thereof, before mentioned, ſhould be diſtributed in each county, in ſuch a manner as to be readily uſed for evidence in all caſes where meaſures and weights ſhould be queſtioned before the ſaid commiſſioners, and for adjuſting the ſame in a proper manner.

cherished and cultivated, for the support of the war, which, it must be owned, was prosecuted with an ardour and efficacy peculiar to the present administration. True it is, the German war had been for some time adopted as an object of importance by the British councils, and a resolution was taken to maintain it without flinching: at the same time, it must be allowed, that this consideration had not hitherto weakened the attention of the ministry to the operations in America, where alone the war may be said to have been carried on and prosecuted on British principles, so as to distress the enemy in their most tender part, and at the same time acquire the most substantial advantages to the subjects of Britain. For these two purposes, every preparation was made that sagacity could suggest, or vigour execute. The navy was repaired and augmented, and in order to man the different squadrons, the expedient of pressing, that disgrace to a British administration, was practised both by land and water with extraordinary rigour and vivacity. A proclamation was issued, offering a considerable bounty for every seaman and even landman that should, by a certain day, enter voluntarily into the service. As an additional encouragement to this class of people, the king promised his pardon to all seamen who had deserted from the respective ships to which they belonged, provided they should return to their duty by the 3d day of July; but at the same time he declared, that those who should neglect this opportunity, at a time when their country so much required their service, would, upon being apprehended, incur the penalty of a court-martial, and, if convicted, be deemed unfit objects of the royal mercy. All justices of the peace, mayors, and magistrates of corporations throughout Great-Britain were commanded to make particular search for straggling seamen fit for the service, and to send all that should be found to the nearest sea-port, that they might be sent on board by the sea-officer there commanding. Other methods more gentle and effectual were taken to levy and recruit the land-forces. New regiments were raised, on his majesty's promise, that every man should be entitled to his discharge at the end of three years, and the premiums for enlisting were increased. Over and above these indulgencies, considerable bounties were offered and given by cities, towns, corporations, and even by individuals, so universally were the people possessed with a spirit of chivalry and adventure. The example was set by the metropolis, where the common-council resolved that voluntary subscriptions should be received in the chamber of London, to be appropriated as bounty-money to such persons as should engage in his majesty's service. The city subscribed a considerable sum for that purpose; and a committee of aldermen and commoners was appointed to attend at Guildhall, to receive and apply the subscriptions. As a further encouragement to volunteers, they moreover resolved, that every person so entering should be intitled to the freedom of the city, at the expiration of three years, or sooner, if the war should be brought to a conclusion. These resolutions being communicated to the king, he was pleased to signify his approbation, and return his thanks to the city, in a letter from the secretary of state to the lord-mayor. Large sums were immediately subscribed by different companies, and some private persons; and, in imitation of the capital, bounties were offered by many different communities in every quarter of the united kingdom. At the same time, such care and diligence were used in disciplining the militia, that before the close of the year, the greater part of those truly constitutional battalions rivalled the regular troops in the perfection of their exercise, and seemed to be in all respects as fit for actual service.

Before we proceed to record the transactions of the campaign that succeeded these preparations, we shall take notice of some domestic events, which, though not very important in themselves, may nevertheless claim a place in the history of England. In the beginning of the year, the court of London was overwhelmed with affliction at the death of the princess-dowager of Orange and Nassau, gouvernante of the United Provinces in the minority of her son, the present stadtholder. She was the eldest daughter of his Britannick majesty, possessed of many personal accomplishments and exemplary virtues, pious, moderate, sensible, and circumspect. She had exercised her authority with equal sagacity and resolution, respected even by those who were no friends to the house of Orange, and died with great fortitude and resignation[c]. In her will she appointed the king her father, and the princess-dowager of Orange, her mother-in-law, honorary tutors, and prince Louis of Brunswick acting tutor to her children. In the morning after her decease, the states-general and the states of Holland were extraordinarily assembled, and having received notice of this event, proceeded to confirm the regulations which had been made for the minority of the stadtholder. Prince Louis of Brunswick was invited to assist in the assembly of Holland, where he took the oaths, as representing the captain-general of the union. Then he communicated to the assembly the act by which the princess had appointed him guardian of her children. He was afterwards invited to the assembly of the states-general, who agreed to the resolution of Holland with respect to his guardianship; and in the evening, the different colleges of the government sent formal deputations to the young stadtholder, and the princess Caroline, his sister, in whose names and presence they were received, and answered by their guardian and representative. A formal intimation of the death of the princess was communicated to the king her father, in a pathetic letter, by the states-general, who condoled with him on the irreparable loss which he as well as they had sustained by this melancholy event, and assured him they would employ all their care and attention in securing and defending the rights and interests of the young stadtholder, and the princess his sister, whom they considered as the children of the republic. The royal family of England suffered another disaster in the course of this year, by the decease of the princess Elizabeth-Caroline, second daughter of his late royal highness Frederick prince of Wales, a lady of the most amiable character, who died at Kew in the month of September, before she had attained the 18th year of her age.

Certain privateers continuing their excesses at sea, and rifling neutral ships without distinction or authority, the government resolved to vindicate the honour of the nation, by making examples of those pirates, who, as fast as they could be detected and secured, were brought to trial, and upon conviction sacrificed to justice. While these steps were taken to rescue the nation from the reproach of violence and rapacity, which her neighbours had urged with such eagerness, equal spirit was exerted in convincing neutral powers that they should not, with impunity, contravene the law of nations, in favouring the enemies of Great-Britain. A great number of causes were tried relating to disputed captures, and many Dutch vessels, with their cargoes, were condemned after a fair hearing, notwithstanding the loud clamours of that people, and the repeated remonstrances of the states-general.

The reputation of the English was not so much affected by the irregularities of her privateers, armed for rapine, as by the neglect of internal police, and an ingredient of savage ferocity mingled in the national character; an ingredient that appeared but too conspicuous in the particulars of several shocking murders brought to light about this period.—One Halsey, who commanded a merchant-ship in the voyage from Jamaica to England, having conceived some personal dislike to a poor sailor, insulted him with such abuse, exposed him to such hardships, and punished him with such wantonness of barbarity, that the poor wretch leaped overboard in despair. His inhuman tyrant envying him that death, which would have rescued a miserable object from his brutality, plunged into the sea after him, and brought him on board, declaring he should not escape so, while there were any torments left to inflict. Accordingly, he exercised his tyranny upon him with redoubled rigour, until the poor creature expired, in consequence of the inhuman treatment he had sustained. This savage ruffian was likewise indicted for the murder of another mariner, but being convicted on the first trial, the second was found unnecessary, and the criminal suffered death according to the law, which is perhaps too mild to malefactors convicted of such aggravated cruelty. Another barbarous murder was perpetrated in the country, near Birmingham, upon a sheriff's officer, by the sons of one Darby, whose effects the bailiff had seized, on a distress for rent. The two young aſſaſſins, encouraged by the father, attacked the unhappy wretch with clubs, and mangled him in a terrible manner, ſo that he hardly retained any ſigns of life. Not contented with this cruel execution, they ſtripped him naked, and dragged him out of the houſe, ſcourged him with a waggoner's whip, until the fleſh was cut from his bones. In this miſerable condition he was found weltering in his blood, and conveyed to a neighbouring houſe, where he immediately expired. The three barbarians were apprehended, after having made a deſperate reſiſtance. They were tried, convicted, and executed: the ſons were hung in chains, and the body of the father diſſected. The widow of a timber-merchant at Rotherhithe being cruelly murdered in her own houſe, Mary Edmonſon, a young woman, her niece, ran out into the ſtreet with her own arms cut acroſs, and gave the alarm, declaring her aunt had been aſſaſſinated by four men, who forced their way into the houſe, and that ſhe (the niece) had received thoſe wounds, in attempting to defend her relation. According to the circumſtances that appeared, this unnatural wretch had cut the throat of her aunt and benefactreſs with a caſe-knife, then dragged the body from the waſh-houſe to the parlour; that ſhe had ſtolen a watch and ſome ſilver ſpoons, and concealed them, together with the knife and her own apron, which was ſoaked with the blood of her parent. After having acted this horrid tragedy, the bare recital of which the humane reader will not peruſe without horror, ſhe put on another apron, and wounded her own fleſh, the better to conceal her guilt. Notwithſtanding theſe precautions ſhe was ſuſpected, and committed to priſon. Being brought to trial, ſhe was convicted and condemned upon circumſtantial evidence, and finally executed on Kennington-Common, though ſhe denied the fact to the laſt moment of her life. At the place of execution ſhe behaved with great compoſure, and, after having ſpent ſome minutes in devotion, proteſted ſhe was innocent of the crime laid to her charge. What ſeemed to corroborate this proteſtation, was the condition and character of the young woman, who had been educated in a ſphere above the vulgar, and maintained a reputation without reproach in the country, where ſhe was actually betrothed to a clergyman. On the other hand, the circumſtances that appeared againſt her almoſt amounted to a certainty, though nothing weaker than proof poſitive ought to determine a jury in capital caſes to give a verdict againſt the perſon accuſed. After all, this is one of thoſe problematic events which elude the force of all evidence, and ſerve to confound the pride of human reaſon. A miſcreant, whoſe name was Haines, having eſpouſed the daughter of a farmer in the neighbourhood of Gloceſter, who poſſeſſed a ſmall eſtate, which he intended to divide among ſeven children, was ſo abandoned as to form the deſign of poiſoning the whole family, that by virtue of his wife he might enjoy the whole inheritance. For the execution of this infernal ſcheme, he employed his own father to purchaſe a quantity of arſenic; part of which he adminiſtered to three of the children, who were immediately ſeized with the dreadful ſymptoms produced by this mineral, and the eldeſt expired. He afterwards mixed it with three apple-cakes, which he bought for the purpoſe, and preſented to the other three children, who underwent the ſame violence of operation which had proved fatal to the eldeſt brother. The inſtantaneous effects of the poiſon created a ſuſpicion of Haines, who being examined, the whole ſcene of villainy ſtood diſcloſed. Nevertheleſs, the villain found means to eſcape. The uncommon ſpirit of aſſaſſination which raged at this period ſeemed to communicate itſelf even to foreigners, who breathed Engliſh air. Five French priſoners, confined on board the king's ſhip the Royal Oak, were convicted of having murdered one Jean de Manaux, their countryman and fellow-priſoner, in revenge for his having diſcovered that they had forged paſſes to facilitate their eſcape. Exaſperated at this detection, they ſeized this unfortunate informer in the place of their confinement, gagged his mouth, ſtripped him naked, tied him with a ſtrong cord to a ring bolt, and ſcourged his body with the moſt brutal perſeverance. By dint of ſtruggling the poor wretch diſengaged himſelf from the cord with which he had been tied: then they finiſhed the tragedy, by leaping and ſtamping on his breaſt, till the cheſt was broke, and he expired. They afterwards ſevered the body into ſmall pieces, and theſe they conveyed at different times into the ſea, through the funnel of a convenience to which they had acceſs; but one of the other priſoners gave information of the murder, in conſequence of which they were ſecured, brought to trial, condemned, and puniſhed with death.

[c] Feeling her end approaching, she delivered a key to one of her attendants, directing him to fetch two papers, which she signed with her own hand. One was a contract of marriage between her daughter and the prince of Nassau-Weisburg; the other was a letter to the states-general, beseeching them to consent to this marriage, and preserve inviolate the regulations she had made, touching the education and tutelage of the young stadtholder. These two papers being signed and sealed, she sent for her children, exhorted them to make proper improvements on the education they had received, and to live in harmony with each other. Then she implored heaven to shower its blessings on them both, and embraced them with the most affecting marks of maternal tenderness. She afterwards continued to converse calmly and deliberately with her friends, and in a few hours expired.

Nor were the inſtances of cruel aſſaſſination which prevailed at this juncture confined to Great-Britain. At the latter end of the foregoing year, an atrocious maſſacre was perpetrated by two Genoeſe mariners upon the maſter and crew of an Engliſh veſſel, among whom they were enrolled. Theſe monſters of cruelty were in different watches, a circumſtance that favoured the execution of the horrid plan they had concerted. When one of them retired to reſt with his fellows of the watch, conſiſting of the mate and two ſeamen, he waited till they were faſt aſleep, and then butchered them all with a knife. Having ſo far ſucceeded without diſcovery, he returned to the dec, and communicated the exploit to his aſſociate: then they ſuddenly attacked the maſter of the veſſel, and cleft his head with a hatchet, which they likewiſe uſed in murdering the man that ſtood at the helm; a third was likewiſe diſpatched, and no Engliſhman remained alive but the maſter's ſon, a boy, who lamented his father's death with inceſſant tears and cries for three days, at the expiration of which he was likewiſe ſacrificed, becauſe the aſſaſſins were diſturbed by his clamour. This barbarous ſcene was acted within 60 leagues of the roc of Liſbon; but the veſſel was taken between the capes Ortugal and Finiſterre, by the captain of a French privateer called La Favourite, who ſeeing the dec ſtained with blood, and finding all the papers of the ſhip deſtroyed, began to ſuſpect that the maſter and crew had been murdered. He accordingly taxed them with the murder, and they confeſſed the particulars. The privateer touched at Vigo, where the captain imparted this detail to the Engliſh conſul; but the prize, with the two villains on board, was ſent to Bayonne in France, where they were brought to condign puniſhment.

We ſhall cloſe this regiſter of blood with the account of a murder remarkable in all its circumſtances, for which a perſon, called Eugene Aram, ſuffered at York, in the courſe of this year. This man, who exerciſed the profeſſion of a ſchoolmaſter at Knareſborough, had, as far bac as the year 1745, been concerned with one Houſeman, in robbing and murdering Daniel Clarke, whom they had previouſly perſuaded to borrow a conſiderable quantity of valuable effects from different perſons in the neighbourhood on falſe pretences, that he might retire with the booty. He had accordingly filled a ſac with theſe particulars, and began his retreat with his two perfidious aſſociates, who ſuddenly fell upon him, deprived him of life, and, having buried the body in a cave, took poſſeſſion of the plunder. Though Clarke diſappeared at once in ſuch a myſterious manner, no ſuſpicion fell upon the aſſaſſins; and Aram, who was the chief contriver and agent in the murder, moved his habitation to another part of the country. In the ſummer of the preſent year, Houſeman being employed, among other labourers, in repairing the public highway, they, in digging for gravel by the road ſide, diſcovered the ſkeleton of a human creature, which the majority ſuppoſed to be the bones of Daniel Clarke. This opinion was no ſooner broached, than Houſeman, as it were by ſome ſupernatural impulſe which he could not reſiſt, declared that it was not the ſkeleton of Clarke, inaſmuch as his body had been interred in a place called ſir Robert's Cave, where they would find it, with the head turned to a certain corner. He was immediately apprehended, examined, admitted as evidence for the crown, and diſcovered the particulars of the murder. The ſkeleton of Clarke being found exactly in the place and manner he had deſcribed, Eugene Aram, who now acted as uſher to a grammar-ſchool in the county of Norfolk, was ſecured, and brought to trial at the York aſſizes. There, his own wife corroborating the teſtimony of Houſeman, he was found guilty, and received ſentence of death, notwithſtanding a very artful and learned defence, in which he proved, from argument and example, the danger of convicting a man upon circumſtantial evidence. Finding all his remonſtrances ineffectual, he recommended himſelf in pathetic terms to the king's mercy; and if ever murder was entitled to indulgence, perhaps it might have been extended, not improperly, to this man, whoſe genius, in itſelf prodigious, might have exerted itſelf in works of general utility. He had, in ſpite of all the diſadvantages attending low birth and ſtraitened circumſtances, by the dint of his own capacity and inclination made conſiderable progreſs in mathematicks and philoſophy, acquired all the languages ancient and modern, and executed part of a Celtick dictionary, which, had he lived to execute it, might have thrown ſome eſſential light upon the origin and obſcurities of the European hiſtory. Convinced, at laſt, that he had nothing to hope from the clemency of the govern-

BRITISH
15 JY30
MUSEUM

London: Engravid for Harrison's Edition of Rapin.

GEORGE FRIDERIC HANDEL

Goldar sculp.

In the Collection of the Hon.ble John Spencer Esq.r

Publish'd as the Act directs Sept.r 10. 1795.

ment, he wrote a ſhort poem in defence of ſuicide; and, on the day fixed for his execution, opened the veins of his left arm with a razor, which he had concealed for that purpoſe. Though he was much weakened by the effuſion of blood, before this attempt was diſcovered; yet, as the inſtrument had miſſed the artery, he did not expire until he was carried to the gibbet, and underwent the ſentence of the law. His body was conveyed to Knareſborough-foreſt, and hung in chains, near the place where the murder was perpetrated. Theſe are ſome of the moſt remarkable that appeared among many other inſtances of homicide: a crime that prevails to a degree alike deplorable and ſurpriſing, even in a nation renowned for compaſſion and placability. But this will generally be the caſe among people whoſe paſſions, naturally impetuous, are ill reſtrained, by laws, and the regulations of civil ſociety, which the licentious do not fear, and the wicked hope to evade.

The prince of Wales having, in the beginning of June, entered the two-and twentieth year of his age, the anniverſary of his birth was celebrated with great rejoicings at court, and the king received compliments of congratulation on the majority of a prince, who ſeemed born to fulfil the hopes and complete the happineſs of Great-Britain. The city of London preſented an addreſs to the king on this occaſion, replete with expreſſions of loyalty and affection, aſſuring his majeſty, that no hoſtile threats could intimidate a people animated by the love of liberty, who, confiding in the Divine Providence, and in his majeſty's experienced wiſdom and vigorous councils, were reſolved to exert their utmoſt efforts towards enabling their ſovereign to repel the inſults and defeat the attempts made by the ancient enemies of his crown and kingdom. Congratulations of the ſame kind were offered by other cities, towns, corporations, and communities, who vied with each other in profeſſions of attachment; and, indeed, there was not the leaſt trace of diſaffection perceivable at this juncture in any part of the iſland.

So little were the citizens of London diſtreſſed by the expence, or incommoded by the operations of the war, that they found leiſure to plan, and funds to execute magnificent works of art, for the ornament of the metropolis, and the convenience of commerce. They had obtained an act of parliament, empowering them to build a new bridge over the Thames, from Black-friars to the oppoſite ſhore, about midway between thoſe of London and Weſtminſter. Commiſſioners were appointed to put this act in execution; and, at a court of common-council, it was reſolved that a ſum not exceeding 144,000l. ſhould be forthwith raiſed, within the ſpace of eight years, by inſtalments, not exceeding 30,000l. in one year, to be paid into the chamber of London; that the perſons advancing the money ſhould have an intereſt at the rate of 4l. per cent. per annum, to be paid half yearly by the chamberlain, yet redeemable at the expiration of the firſt 10 years; and that the chamberlain ſhould affix the city's ſeal to ſuch inſtruments as the committee might think fit to give for ſecuring the payment of the ſaid annuities. Such were the firſt effectual ſteps taken towards the execution of the laudable meaſure, which met with the moſt obſtinate oppoſition in the ſequel, from the narrow views of particular people, as well as from the prejudice of party.

The ſpirit that now animated the citizens of London was ſuch as ſmall difficulties did not retard, and even conſiderable loſſes could not diſcourage. In the month of November the city was expoſed to a dangerous conflagration, kindled in the night by accident in the neighbourhood of the Royal Exchange, which burned with great fury, notwithſtanding the aſſiſtance of firemen and engines employed under the perſonal direction of the magiſtracy, conſumed a good number of houſes, and damaged many more. That whole quarter of the town was filled with conſternation: ſome individuals were beggared; one or two periſhed in the flames, and ſome were buried in the ruins of the houſes that ſunk under the diſaſter.

The ferment of mind ſo peculiar to the natives of Great-Britain, excited by a ſtrong mixture of genius and caprice, paſſion and philoſophy, ſtudy and conjecture, produced at this period ſome flowers of improvement, in different arts and ſciences, that ſeemed to promiſe fruit of public utility. Several perſons invented methods for diſcovering the longitude at ſea, and great deſideratum in navigation, for the aſcertainment of which ſo many nations have offered a public recompence, and in the inveſtigation of which ſo many mathematical heads have been diſordered. Some of thoſe who now appeared candidates for the prize deſerved encouragement for the ingenuity of their ſeveral ſyſtems; but he who ſeemed to enjoy the pre-eminence in the opinion and favour of the public, was mr. Irwin a native of Ireland, who contrived a chair ſo artfully poiſed, that a perſon ſitting in it on board a ſhip, even in a rough ſea, can, through a teleſcope, obſerve the immerſion and emerſion of Jupiter's ſatellites, without being interrupted or incommoded by the motion of the veſſel. This gentleman was favoured with the aſſiſtance and protection of commodore lord Howe, in whoſe preſence the experiment was tried in ſeveral ſhips at ſea with ſuch ſucceſs, that he granted a certificate, ſignifying his approbation; and in conſequence of this, mr. Irwin is ſaid to have obtained a conſiderable reward from the board of admiralty.

The people of England, happy in their ſituation, felt none of the ſtorms of war and deſolation which ravaged the neighbouring countries; but, enriched by a ſurpriſing augmentation of commerce, enjoyed all the ſecurity of peace, and all the pleaſures of taſte and affluence. The univerſity of Oxford having conferred the office of their chancellor, vacant by the death of the earl of Arran, upon another nobleman of equal honour and integrity, namely, the earl of Weſtmorland, he made a public entrance into that celebrated ſeat of learning with great magnificence, and was enſtalled amidſt the encænia, which were celebrated with ſuch claſſical elegance of pomp, as might have rivalled the chief Roman feſtival of the Auguſtan age. The chancellor elect was attended by a ſplendid train of the nobility and perſons of diſtinction. The city of Oxford was filled with a vaſt concourſe of ſtrangers. The proceſſions were contrived with taſte, and conducted with decorum. The inſtallation was performed with the moſt ſtriking ſolemnity. The congratulatory verſes, and public ſpeeches, breathed the ſpirit of old Rome; and the ceremony was cloſed by dr. King, that venerable ſage of St. Mary Hall, who pronounced an oration in praiſe of the new chancellor with all the flow of Tully, animated by the fire of Demoſthenes.

We ſhall conclude the remarkable incidents of this year[d], that are detached from the proſecution of the war, with the detail of an event equally ſurpriſing and deplorable:—A ſloop called the Dolphin, bound from the Canaries to New-York, met with ſuch unfavourable weather, that ſhe was detained 165 days in the paſſage, and the proviſions of the ſhip was altogether expended before the firſt 50 days were elapſed. The wretched crew had devoured their dog, cat, and all their ſhoes on board: at length, being reduced to the utmoſt extremity, they agreed to caſt lots for their lives, that the body of him upon whom the lot ſhould fall might ſerve for ſome time to ſupport the ſurvivors. The wretched victim was one Antonio Galatia, a Spaniſh gentleman and paſſenger. Him they ſhot with a muſquet; and having cut off his head, threw it overboard; but the entrails, and the reſt of the carcaſe, they greedily devoured. This horred banquet having, as it were, fleſhed the famiſhed crew, they began to talk of another ſacrifice, from which, however, they were diverted by the influence and remonſtrances of their captain, who prevailed upon them to be ſatisfied with a miſerable allowance to each per diem, cut from a pair of leather breeches found in the cabbin. Upon this calamitous pittance, re-enforced with the graſs which grew plentifully upon the dec, theſe poor objects made ſhift to ſubſiſt for 20 days, at the expiration of which they were relieved, and taken on board one captain Bradſhaw, who chanced to fall in with them at ſea. By this time the whole crew, conſiſting of ſeven men, were ſo ſqualed and emaciated, as to exhibit an appearance at once piteous and terrible; and ſo reduced in point of ſtrength, that it was found neceſſary to uſe ropes and tackle for hoiſting them from one ſhip to the other. The circumſtance of the lot falling upon the Spaniard, who was the only foreigner on board, encourages a ſuſpicion that foul play was offered to this unfortunate victim.

[d] In the ſpring of this year the liberal arts ſuſtained a lamentable loſs in the death of George Frederick Handel, the moſt celebrated maſter in muſic which his age had produced. He was by birth a German; but had ſtudied in Italy, and afterwards ſettled in England, where he met with the moſt favourable reception, and reſided above half a century, univerſally admired for his ſtupendous genius in the ſublime parts of muſical compoſition.

One would be apt to imagine that there was ſomething in the conſtitution of the air at this period, which was particularly unfavourable to old age, inaſmuch as, in the compaſs of a few months, the following perſons, remarkable for their longevity, died in the kingdom of Scotland: William Barnes, who had been above 70 years a ſervant in the family of Brodie, died there, at the age of 109. Catharine Mackenzie died in Roſsſhire, at the age of 118. Janet Blair, deceaſed at Monemuſk, in the ſhire of Aberdeen, turned of 112. Alexander Stephens, in Bamffſhire, at the age of 108. Janet Harper, at Bains-hole, at the age of 107. Daniel Cameron, in Rannach, married when he was turned of 100, and ſurvived his marriage 30 years.

fortunate ſtranger; but the moſt remarkable part of this whole incident is, that the maſter and crew could not contrive ſome ſort of tackle to catch fiſh, with which the ſea every where abounds, and which, no doubt, might be caught with the help of a little ingenuity. If implements of this kind were provided in every ſhip, they would probably prevent all thoſe tragical events at ſea that are occaſioned by famine.

Previous to the more capital operations in war, we ſhall particularize the moſt remarkable captures that were made upon the enemy by ſingle ſhips of war, during the courſe of this ſummer and autumn. In the month of February, a French privateer belonging to Granville, called the Marquis de Marigny, having on board near 200 men, and mounted with 20 cannon, was taken by captain Parker, commander of his majeſty's ſhip the Montague; who likewiſe made prize of a ſmaller armed veſſel, from Dunkirk, of eight cannon and 60 men. About the ſame period, captain Graves, of the Unicorn, brought in the Moras privateer, of St. Maloes, carrying 200 men, and 22 cannon. Two large merchant-ſhips, loaded on the French king's account for Martinique, with proviſion, clothing, and arms, for the troops on that iſland, were taken by captain Lendrick, commander of the Brilliant; and an Engliſh tranſport from St. John's, having 400 French priſoners on board, periſhed near the Weſtern iſlands. Within the circle of the ſame month, a large French ſhip from St. Domingo, richly laden fell in with the Favourite ſhip of war, and was carried into Gibraltar.

In the month of February, captain Hood, of his majeſty's frigate the Veſtal, belonging to a ſmall ſquadron commanded by admiral Holmes, who had ſailed for the Weſt-Indies in January, being advanced a conſiderable way a-head of the fleet, deſcried and gave chaſe to a ſail, which proved to be a French frigate called the Bellona, of 220 men, and 32 great guns, commanded by the count de Beauhonoire. Captain Hood, having made a ſignal to the admiral, continued the chaſe until he advanced within half muſquet-ſhot of the enemy, and then poured in a broadſide, which was immediately retorted. The engagement thus begun was maintained with great vigour on both ſides for the ſpace of four hours; at the expiration of which the Bellona ſtruc, after having loſt all her maſts and rigging, together with about 40 men killed in the action. Nor was the victor in a much better condition. Thirty men were killed and wounded on board the Veſtal. Immediately after the enemy ſubmitted, all her rigging being deſtroyed by the ſhot, the topmaſts fell overboard; and ſhe was otherwiſe ſo much damaged, that ſhe could not proceed on her voyage. Captain Hood, therefore, returned with his prize to Spithead; and afterwards met with a gracious reception from his majeſty, on account of the valour and conduct he had diſplayed on this occaſion. The Bellona had ſailed in January from the iſland of Martinique, along with the Floriſſant, and another French frigate, from which ſhe had been ſeparated in the paſſage. Immediately after this exploit, captain Elliot, of the Æolus frigate, accompanied by the Iſis, made prize of a French ſhip, the Mignonne, of 20 guns, and 140 men, one of four frigates employed as convoy to a large fleet of merchant-ſhips, near the iſland of Rhée.

In the month of March, the Engliſh frigates the Southampton and Melampe, commanded by the captains Gilchriſt and Hotham, being at ſea to the northward on a cruiſe, fell in with the Danaë, a French ſhip of 40 cannon, and 330 men, which was engaged by captain Hotham in a ſhip of half the force, who maintained the battle a conſiderable time with admirable gallantry, before his conſort could come to his aſſiſtance. As they fought in the dark captain Gilchriſt was obliged to lie by for ſome time, becauſe he could not diſtinguiſh the one from the other; but no ſooner did the day appear than he bore down upon the Danaë with his uſual impetuoſity, and ſoon compelled her to ſurrender: ſhe did not ſtrike, however, until 30 or 40 of her men were ſlain: and the gallant captain Gilchriſt received a grape-ſhot in his ſhoulder, which, though it did not deprive him of life, yet rendered him incapable of future ſervice: a misfortune the more to be lamented, as it happened to a brave officer in the vigour of his age, and in the midſt of a ſanguinary war, which might have afforded him many other opportunities of ſignalizing his courage for the honour and advantage of his country. Another remarkable exploit was achieved about the ſame juncture by captain Barrington, commander of the ſhip Achilles, mounted with 60 cannon, who, to the weſtward of Cape-Fineſterre, encountered a French ſhip of equal force, called the count de St. Florintin, bound from Cape-François on the iſland of Hiſpaniolo to Rochefort, under the command of the ſieur de Montay, who was obliged to ſtrike, after a cloſe and obſtinate engagement, in which he himſelf was mortally wounded, a great number of his men ſlain, and his ſhip ſo damaged, that ſhe was with difficulty brought into Falmouth. Captain Barrington obtained the victory at the expence of about 25 men killed and wounded, and all his rigging, which the enemy's ſhot rendered uſeleſs. Two ſmall privateers from Dunkirk were alſo taken, one called the Marquis de Bareil, by the Brilliant, which carried her into Kinſale in Ireland; the other called the Carillonneur, which ſtruc to the Grace cutter, aſſiſted by the boats of the ſhip Rocheſter, commanded by captain Duff, who ſent her into the Downs.

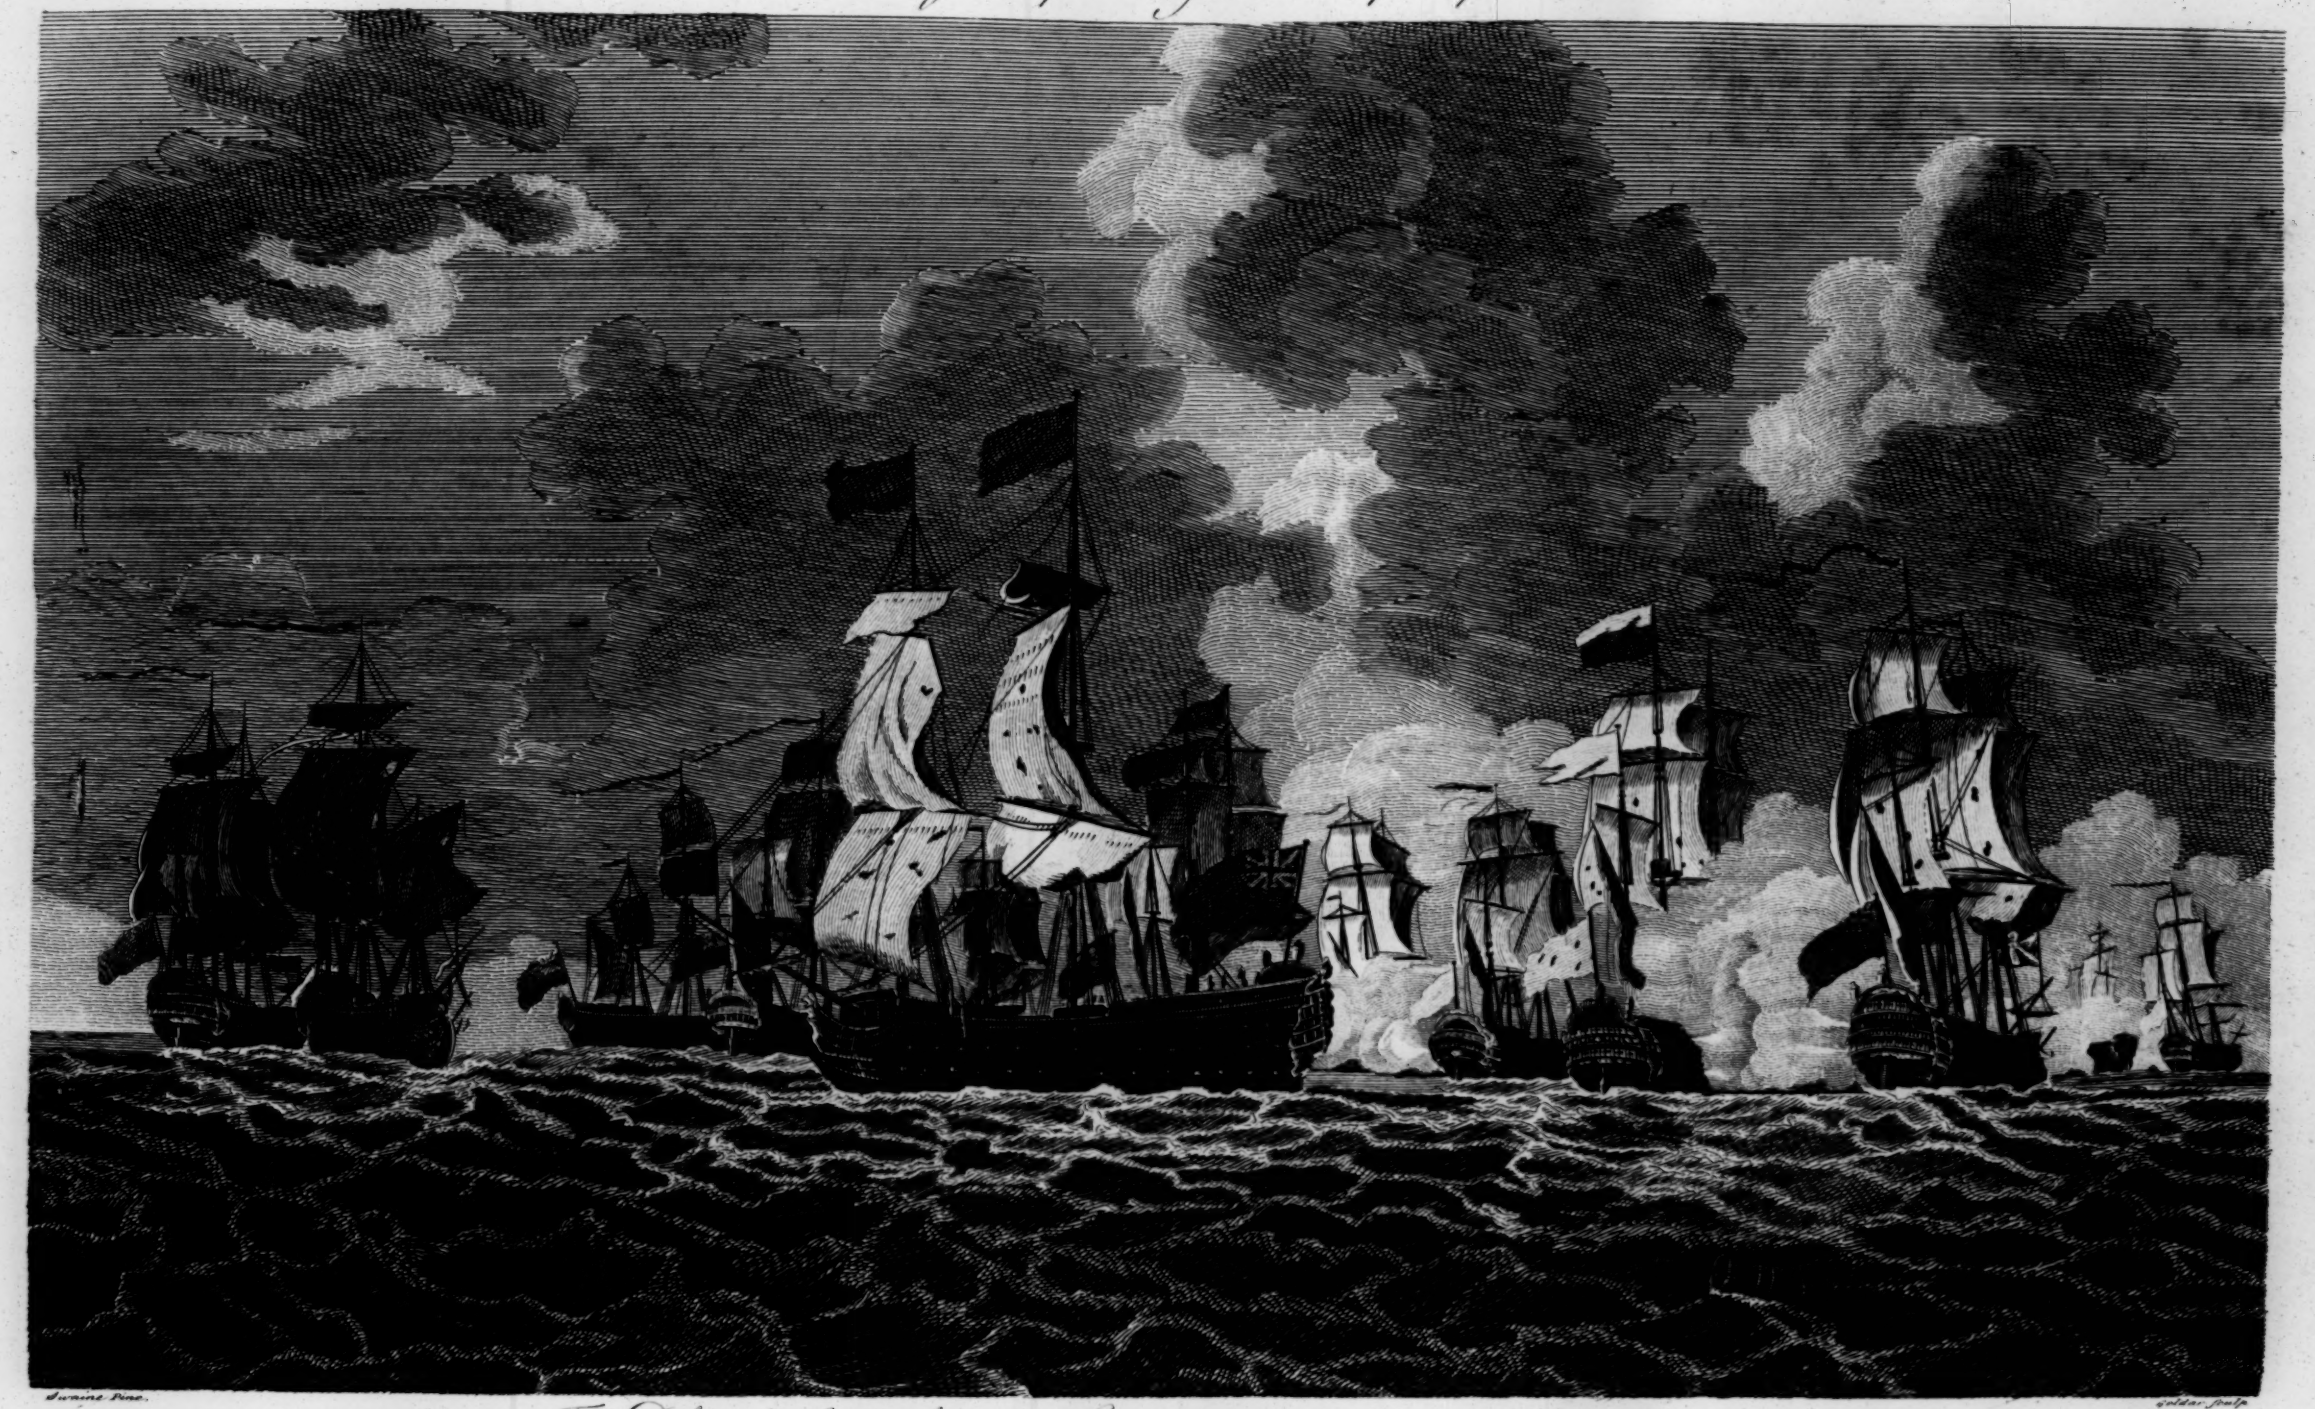
About the latter end of March, captain Samuel Falkner, in the ſhip Windſor, of 60 guns, cruiſing to the weſtward, diſcovered four large ſhips to leeward, which, when he approached them, formed the line of battle a-head, in order to give him a warm reception. He accordingly cloſed with the ſternmoſt ſhip, which ſuſtained his fire about an hour; then the other three bearing away with all the ſail they could carry, ſhe ſtruc her colours, and was conducted to Liſbon. She proved to be the Duc de Chartres, pierced for 60 cannon, though at that time carrying no more than 24, with a complement of 300 men, about 30 of whom were killed in the action. She belonged, with the other three that eſcaped, to the French Eaſt-India company, was loaded with gunpowder and naval ſtores, and bound for Pondicherry. Two privateers, called La Chaſſeur and Le Conquerant, the one from Dunkirk, and the other from Cherbourg, were taken and carried into Plymouth by captain Hughs, of his majeſty's frigate the Tamer. A third, called the Deſpatch, from Morlaix, was brought into Penzance by the Diligence ſloop, under the command of captain Eaſtwood. A fourth, called the Baſque, from Bayonne, furniſhed with 22 guns, and above 200 men, fell into the hands of captain Parker, of the Brilliant, who conveyed her into Plymouth. Captain Antrobus, of the Surpriſe, took the Vieux, a privateer of Bourdeaux; and a fifth, from Dunkirk, ſtruc to captain Knight, of the Liverpool, off Yarmouth. In the month of May a French frigate, called the Arethuſa, mounted with 32 cannon, manned with a large complement of hands, under the command of the marquis de Vaudrieul, ſubmitted to two Britiſh frigates, the Venus and the Thames, commanded by the captains Harriſon and Colby, after a warm engagement, in which 60 men were killed and wounded on the ſide of the enemy. In the beginning of June an armed ſhip belonging to Dunkirk, was brought into the Downs, by captain Angel, of the Stag; and a privateer of force, called the Counteſs de la Serre, was ſubdued and taken, after an obſtinate action, by captain Moore, of his majeſty's ſhip the Adventure.

Several armed ſhips of the enemy, and rich prizes, were taken in the Weſt-Indies, particularly two French frigates, and two Dutch ſhips with French commodities, all richly laden, by ſome of the ſhips of the ſquadron which vice-admiral Coats commanded on the Jamaica ſtation. A fifth, called the Velour, from St. Domingo, with a valuable cargo on board, being fortified with 20 cannon, and above 160 men, fell in with the Favourite ſloop of war, under the command of captain Edwards, who, after an obſtinate diſpute, carried her in triumph to Gibraltar. At St. Chriſtopher's, in the Weſt-Indies, captain Collingwood, commander of the king's ſhip the Creſcent, attacked two French frigates, the Amethyſte and Berkeley; the former of which eſcaped, after a warm engagement, in which the Creſcent's rigging was ſo much damaged, that ſhe could not purſue; but the other was taken, and conveyed into the harbour of Baſſeterre. Notwithſtanding the vigilance and courage of the Engliſh cruiſers in thoſe ſeas, the French privateers ſwarmed to ſuch a degree, that in the courſe of this year they took above 200 ſail of Britiſh ſhips, valued at 600,000l. ſterling. This their ſucceſs is the more remarkable, as by this time the iſland of Guadaloupe was in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, and commodore Moore commanded a numerous ſquadron in thoſe very latitudes.

In the beginning of October, the Hercules ſhip of war, mounted with 74 guns, under the command of captain Porter, cruiſing in the chops of the channel, deſcried to windward a large ſhip, which proved to be the Floriſſant, of the ſame force with the Hercules. Her commander, perceiving the Engliſh ſhip giving chaſe, did not ſeem to decline the action; but bore down upon her in a ſlanting direction, and the engagement began with great fury. In a little

BRITISH MUSEUM
15 JY 60

London Engravd for Harrisons Edition of Rapin.



The Defeat of a French Squardron Commanded by Mons.r de la Clue. off Cape Sagres on the 18.th of August 1759. by a Squadron of HIS MAJESTYS SHIPS under the Command of the Right Hon.ble EDWARD HOSCAWEN. Admiral of the Blue.

Published as the Act directs Aug.t 1.st 1760.

Durame Pinx.

Goldar Sculp.

time, the Hercules having loſt her top-maſt, and all her rigging being ſhot away, the enemy took advantage of this diſaſter, made the beſt of his way, and was purſued till eight o'clock next morning, when he eſcaped behind the iſle of Oleron. Captain Porter was wounded in the head with a grape-ſhot, and loſt the uſe of one leg in the engagement.

Having taken notice of all the remarkable captures and exploits that were made and achieved by ſingle ſhips ſince the commencement of the preſent year, we ſhall now proceed to deſcribe the actions that were performed in this period by the different ſquadrons that conſtituted the naval power of Great-Britain. Intelligence having been received that the enemy meditated an invaſion upon ſome of the Britiſh territories, and that a number of flat-bottomed boats were prepared at Havre-de-Grace, for the purpoſe of diſembarking troops, rear-admiral Rodney was, in the beginning of July, detached with a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips and bombs to annoy and overawe that part of the coaſt of France. He accordingly anchored in the road of Havre, and made a diſpoſition to execute the inſtructions he had received. The bomb-veſſels being placed in the narrow channel of the river leading to Honfleur, began to throw their ſhells, and continued the bombardment for 52 hours, without intermiſſion, during which a numerous body of French troops was employed in throwing up entrenchments, erecting new batteries, and firing both with ſhot and ſhells upon the aſſailants. The town was ſet on fire in ſeveral places, and burned with great fury; ſome of the boats were overturned, and a few of them reduced to aſhes, while the inhabitants forſook the place in the utmoſt conſternation; nevertheleſs, the damage done to the enemy was too inconſiderable to make amends for the expence of the armament, and the loſs of 1900 ſhells and 1100 carcaſſes, which were expened in this expedition. Bombardments of this kind are at beſt but expenſive and unprofitable operations, and may be deemed a barbarous method of proſecuting war, inaſmuch as the damage falls upon the wretched inhabitants, who had given no cauſe of offence, and who are generally ſpared by an humane enemy, unleſs they have committed ſome particular act of provocation.

The honour of the Britiſh flag was much more effectually aſſerted by the gallant admiral Boſcawen, who, as we have already obſerved, was entruſted with the conduct of a ſquadron in the Mediterranean. It muſt be owned, however, that his firſt attempt ſavoured of temerity. Having in vain diſplayed the Britiſh flag in ſight of Toulon, by way of defiance to the French fleet that lay there at anchor, he ordered three ſhips of the line, commanded by the captains Smith, Harland, and Barker, to advance and burn two ſhips that lay cloſe to the mouth of the harbour. They accordingly approached with great intrepedity, and met with a very warm reception from divers batteries which they had not before perceived. Two ſmall forts they attempted to deſtroy, and cannonaded for ſome time with great fury; but being over-matched by ſuperior force, and the wind ſubſiding into a calm, they ſuſtained conſiderable damage, and were towed off with great difficulty, in a very ſhattered condition. The admiral ſeeing three of his beſt ſhips ſo roughly handled in this enterprize, returned to Gibraltar in order to refit; and M. de la Clue, the French commander of the ſquadron at Toulon, ſeized this opportunity of ſailing, in hopes of paſſing the Straits mouth unobſerved, his fleet conſiſting of twelve large ſhips, and three frigates. Admiral Boſcawen, who commanded fourteen ſail of the line, with two frigates, and as many fire-ſhips, having refitted his ſquadron, detached one frigate to cruiſe off Malaga, and another to hover between Eſtepona and Ceuta-point; with a view to keep a good look-out, and give timely notice in caſe the enemy ſhould approach. On the 17th day of Auguſt, at eight in the evening, the Gibraltar frigate made a ſignal that fourteen ſail appeared on the Barbary ſhore, to the eaſtward of Ceuta; upon which the Engliſh admiral immediately heaved up his anchors and went to ſea: at daylight he deſcried ſeven large ſhips lying to; but when the Engliſh ſquadron forebore to anſwer their ſignal, they diſcovered their miſtake, ſet all their ſails, and made the beſt of their way. This was the greater part of the French ſquadron commanded by M. de la Clue, from whom five of his large ſhips and 3 frigates had ſeparated in the night. Even now, perhaps, he might have eſcaped, had he not been obliged to wait for the Souveraine, which was a heavy ſailer. At noon the wind, which had blown a freſh gale, died away, and although admiral Boſcawen had made ſignal to chaſe, and engage in a line of battle a-head, it was not till half an hour after two that ſome of his headmoſt ſhips could cloſe with the rear of the enemy; which, though greatly out-numbered, fought with uncommon bravery. The Engliſh admiral, without waiting to return the fire of the ſternmoſt, which he received as he paſſed, uſed all his endeavours to come up with the Ocean, which M. de la Clue commanded in perſon; and about four o'clock in the afternoon, running athwart her hawſe, poured into her a furious broadſide; thus the engagement began with equal vigour on both ſides. This diſpute, however, was of ſhort duration. In about half an hour admiral Boſcawen's mizen-maſt and topſail-yards were ſhot away; and the enemy hoiſted all the ſail they could carry. Mr Boſcawen having ſhifted his flag from the Namur to the Newark, joined ſome other ſhips in attacking the Centaur, of 74 guns, which, being thus overpowered, was obliged to ſurrender. The Britiſh admiral purſued them all night, during which the Souveraine, and the Guerrier, altered their courſe, and deſerted their commander. At day-break, M. de la Clue, whoſe left leg had been broke in the engagement, perceiving the Engliſh ſquadron crowding all their ſails to come up with him, and finding himſelf on the coaſt of Portugal, determined to burn his ſhips, rather than they ſhould fall into the hands of the victors. The Ocean was run aſhore two leagues from Lagos, near the fort of Almadana, the commander of which fired three ſhot at the Engliſh; another captain of the French ſquadron followed the example of his commander, and both endeavoured to diſembark their men, but the ſea being rough, this proved a very tedious and difficult attempt. The captains of the Temeraire and Modeſte, inſtead of deſtroying their ſhips, anchored as near as they could to the forts Xavier and Lagres, in hopes of enjoying their protection; but in this hope they were diſappointed. M. de la Clue had been landed, and the command of the Ocean was left to the count de Carne, who, having received one broadſide from the America, ſtruc his colours, and the Engliſh took poſſeſſion of this noble prize, the beſt ſhip in the French navy, mounted with 80 cannon. Captain Bently, of the Warſpight, who had remarkably ſignalized himſelf by his courage during the action of the preceding day, attacked the Temeraire, of 74 guns, and brought her off with little damage. Vice-admiral Broderick, the ſecond in command, advancing with his diviſion, burned the Redoubtable, of 74 guns, which was bulged, and abandoned by her men and officers; but they made prize of the Modeſte, carrying 64 guns, which had not been much injured in the engagement. This victory was obtained by the Engliſh admiral at a very ſmall expence of men; the whole number of the killed and wounded not exceeding 250 on board of the Britiſh ſquadron, though the carnage among the enemy muſt have been much more conſiderable, as M. de la Clue, in his letter to the French embaſſador at Liſbon, owned that on board of his own ſhip, the Ocean, 100 men were killed on the ſpot, and 70 dangerouſly wounded: but the moſt ſevere circumſtance of this diſaſter was the loſs of four capital ſhips, two of which were deſtroyed, and the other two brought in triumph to England, to be numbered among the beſt bottoms of the Britiſh navy. What augmented the good fortune of the victors, was, that not one officer loſt his life in the engagement. Captain Bently, whom the admiral diſpatched to England with the tidings of his ſucceſs, met with a gracious reception from the king, who knighted him for his gallantry.

As we propoſe to throw together all the naval tranſactions of the year, eſpecially thoſe that happened in the European ſeas, that they may be comprehended as it were in one view, we muſt now, without regard to time, poſtpone many previous events of importance, and record the laſt action by ſea that in the courſe of this year diſtinguiſhed the flag of Great-Britain. The court of Verſailles, in order to embarrace the Britiſh miniſtry, and divert the attention from all external expeditions, had in the winter projected a plan for invading ſome part of the Britiſh dominions; and in the beginning of the year had actually begun to make preparations on different parts of the coaſt for carrying this deſign into execution. Even as far bac as the latter end of May, meſſages from the king to both houſes of parliament were delivered by the earl of Holderneſſe and mr. Pitt, the two ſecretaries of ſtate, ſignifying that his majeſty had received advices of preparations making by the French court, with a deſign to invade Great-Britain: that though perſuaded, by the univerſal zeal and affection of his people, any ſuch attempt muſt under the bleſſing of God, end in the deſtruction of thoſe who engaged in it: yet he apprehended he ſhould not act conſiſtent with that paternal care and concern which he had always ſhown for the ſafety and preſervation of his ſubjects, if he omitted any means in his power which might be neceſſary for their defence; he therefore acquainted the parliament with his having received repeated intelligence of the enemy's preparations, to the end that his majeſty might, if he ſhould think proper, in purſuance of the late act of parliament, cauſe the militia, or ſuch part thereof as ſhould be neceſſary, to be drawn out and embodied, in order to march as occaſion ſhould require. Theſe meſſages were no ſooner read, than each houſe ſeparately reſolved to preſent an addreſs, thanking his majeſty for having communicated this intelligence; aſſuring him that they would, with their lives and fortunes, ſupport him againſt all attempts whatever: that, warmed with affection and zeal for his perſon and government, and animated by indignation at the daring deſigns of an enemy whoſe fleet had hitherto ſhunned the terror of the Britiſh navy, they would chearfully exert their utmoſt effort to repel all inſults, and effectually enable their ſovereign not only to diſappoint the attemps of France, but, by the bleſſing of God, turn them to their own confuſion. The commons at the ſame time reſolved upon another addreſs, deſiring his majeſty would give directions to his lieutenants of the ſeveral counties, ridings, and places within South-Britain, to uſe the utmoſt diligence and attention in executing the ſeveral acts of parliament made for the better ordering the militia.

Theſe and other precautionary ſteps were accordingly taken; but the adminiſtration wiſely placed their chief dependence upon the ſtrength of the navy, part of which was ſo divided and ſtationed, as to bloc up all the harbours of France in which the enemy were known to make any naval armament of conſequence. We have ſeen in what manner rear-admiral Rodney viſited the town and harbour of Havre-de-Grace, and ſcoured that part of the coaſt in ſucceſſive cruiſes: we have alſo recorded the expedition and victory of admiral Boſcawen over the ſquadron of La Clue, which was equipped at Toulon, with a deſign to aſſiſt in the projected invaſion. Notwithſtanding this diſaſter, the French miniſtry perſiſted in their deſign; towards the execution of which they had prepared another conſiderable fleet, in the harbours of Rochefort, Breſt, and Port-Louis, to be commanded by M. de Conflans, and re-enforced by a conſiderable body of troops, which were actually aſſembled under Duc d'Aiguillon, at Vannes, in Lower Bretagne. Flat-bottomed boats and tranſports to be uſed in this expedition were prepared in different ports on the coaſt of France; and a ſmall ſquadron was equipped at Dunkirk, under the command of an enterprizing adventurer, called Thurot, who had, in the courſe of the preceding year ſignaliſed his courage and conduct in a large privateer called the Belleiſle, which had ſcoured the North ſeas, taken a number of ſhips, and at one time maintained an obſtinate battle againſt two Engliſh frigates, which were obliged to deſiſt, after having received conſiderable damage. This man's name became a terror to the merchants of Great-Britain; for his valour was not more remarkable in battle than his conduct in eluding the purſuit of the Britiſh cruiſers, who were ſucceſſively detached in queſt of him, through every part of the German ocean and North ſea, as far as the iſlands of Orkney. It muſt be likewiſe owned, for the honour of human nature, that this bold mariner, though deſtitute of the advantages of birth and education, was remarkably diſtinguiſhed by his generoſity and compaſſion to thoſe who had the misfortune to fall into his power; and that his deportment in every reſpect entitled him to a much more honourable rank in the ſervice of his country. The court of Verſailles were not inſenſible of his merit. He obtained a commiſſion from the French king, and was veſted with the command of the ſmall armament now fitting out in the harbour of Dunkirk. The Britiſh government being appriſed of all theſe particulars, took ſuch meaſures to defeat the purpoſed invaſion as muſt have conveyed a very high idea of the power of Great-Britain to thoſe who conſidered, that, excluſive of the force oppoſed to this deſign, they at the ſame time carried on the moſt vigorous and important operations of war in Germany, America, the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies. Thurot's armament at Dunkirk was watched by an Engliſh ſquadron in the Downs, commanded by commodore Boys; the port of Havre was guarded by rear-admiral Rodney; mr. Boſcawen had been ſtationed off Toulon, and the coaſt of Vannes was ſcoured by a ſmall ſquadron detached from ſir Edward Hawke, who had during the ſummer blocked up the harbour of Breſt, where Conflans lay with his fleet, in order to be joined by the other diviſions of the armament. Theſe different ſquadrons of the Britiſh navy were connected by a chain of ſeparate cruiſers; ſo that the whole coaſt of France, from Dunkirk to the extremity of Bretagne, was diſtreſſed by an actual blockade.

The French miniſtry being thus hampered, forbore their attempt upon Britain; and the projected invaſion ſeemed to hang in ſuſpence till the month of Auguſt, in the beginning of which their army in Germany was defeated at Minden. Their deſigns in that country being baffled by this diſaſter, they ſeemed to convert their chief attention to their ſea-armament; the preparations were reſumed with redoubled vigour; and even after the defeat of La Clue, they reſolved to try their fortune in a deſcent. They now propoſed to diſembark a body of troops in Ireland. Thurot received orders to ſail from Dunkirk with the firſt opportunity, and ſhape his courſe round the northern parts of Scotland, that he might alarm the coaſt of Ireland, and make a diverſion from that part where Conflans intended to effectuate the diſembarkation of his forces. The tranſports and ſhips of war were aſſembled at Breſt and Rochefort, having on board a train of artillery, with ſaddles, and other accoutrements for cavalry, to be mounted in Ireland; and a body of French troops, including part of the Iriſh brigade, was kept in readineſs to embark. The execution of this ſcheme was, however, prevented by the vigilance of ſir Edward Hawke, who blocked up the harbour of Breſt with a fleet of 23 capital ſhips; while another ſquadron of ſmaller ſhips and frigates, under the command of captain Duff, continued to cruiſe along the French coaſt, from port L'Orient, in Bretagne, to the point of St. Gilles in Poitou. At length, however, in the beginning of November, the Britiſh ſquadron, commanded by ſir Edward Hawke, ſir Charles Hardy, and rear-admiral Geary, were driven from the coaſt of France by ſtreſs of weather, and on the 9th day of the month anchored in Torbay. The French admiral, Conflans, ſnatched this opportunity of ſailing from Breſt, with 21 ſail of the line and four frigates, in hopes of being able to deſtroy the Engliſh ſquadron commanded by capt. Duff, before the large fleet could return from the coaſt of England. Sir Edward Hawke having received intelligence that the French fleet had ſailed from Breſt, immediately ſtood to ſea, in order to purſue them; and in the mean time, the government iſſued orders for guarding all thoſe parts of the coaſt that were thought the moſt expoſed to a deſcent. The land-forces were put in motion, and quartered along the ſhore of Kent and Suſſex: all the ſhips of war in the different harbours, even thoſe that had juſt arrived from America, were ordered to put to ſea, and every ſtep was taken to diſconcert the deſigns of the enemy.

While theſe meaſures were taken with equal vigour and deliberation, ſir Edward Hawke ſteered his courſe directly for Quiberon, on the coaſt of Bretagne, which he ſuppoſed would be the rendezvous of the French ſquadron: but, notwithſtanding his utmoſt efforts, he was driven by a hard gale conſiderably to the weſtward, where he was joined by two frigates, the Maidſtone and Coventry. Theſe he directed to keep a-head of the ſquadron. The weather growing more moderate, the former made a ſignal for ſeeing a fleet, on the 20th day of November, at half an hour paſt eight o'clock in the morning, and in an hour afterwards diſcovered them to be the enemy's ſquadron. They were at that time in chaſe of captain Duff's ſquadron, which now joined the large fleet, after having run ſome riſque of being taken. Sir Edward Hawke, who, when the Maidſtone gave the firſt notice, had formed the line a-breaſt, now perceiving that the French admiral endeavoured to eſcape with all the ſail he could carry, threw out a ſignal for ſeven of his ſhips that were neareſt the enemy to chaſe, and endeavoured to detain them, until they could be re-enforced by the reſt of the ſquadron, which were ordered to form into a line of battle a-head, as they had chaſed, that no time might be loſt in the purſuit. Conſidering the roughneſs of the weather, which was extremely tempeſtuous; the nature of the coaſt, which is in this place rendered very hazardous by a great number of ſand-banks, ſhoals, rocs, and iſlands, as entirely unknown to the Britiſh ſailors, as they were familiar to the French navigators; the dangers of a ſhort day, dark night, and a lee-ſhore; it required extraordinary reſolution in the Engliſh admiral to attempt hoſtilities on this occaſion: but ſir Edward Hawke, ſteeled with the integrity and fortitude of his own heart, animated by a warm love for his country, and well acquainted with the importance of the ſtake on which the ſafety of that country in a great meaſure depended, was reſolved to run extraordinary riſques in his endeavours to fruſtrate at once a boaſted ſcheme projected for the annoyance of his fellow-ſubjects.

London. Engraved for Harrisons Edition of Rapin.

Edwin Pine

Goldar sculp.

The Gallant Action off the Isle of Man where the Brave Capt.n Elliot
Defeated and took the Marshall Belleisle, Commanded by the Famous Thurot
& two other French Ships of War, the 28. of February 1760.

Publ.d as the Act directs Sept.r 30. 1786.

BRITISH MUSEUM 13 JY 66

With reſpect to his ſhips of the line, he had but the advantage of one in point of number, and no ſuperiority in men or metal, conſequently, M. de Conflans might have hazarded a fair battle on the open ſea, without any imputation of temerity: but he thought proper to play a more artful game, though it did not ſucceed according to his expectation. He kept his fleet in a body, and retired cloſe in ſhore, with a view to draw the Engliſh ſquadron among the ſhoals and iſlands, on which he hoped they would pay dear for their raſhneſs and impetuoſity, while he and his officers, who were perfectly acquainted with the navigation could either ſtay, and take advantage of the diſaſter, or, if hard preſſed, retire through channels unknown to the Britiſh pilots. At half an hour after two the van of the Engliſh fleet began the engagement with the rear of the enemy, in the neighbourhood of Belleiſle. Every ſhip as ſhe advanced poured in a broadſide on the ſternmoſt of the French, and bore down upon their van, leaving the rear to thoſe that came after. Sir Edward Hawke, in the Royal George, of 110 guns, reſerved his fire in paſſing through the rear of the enemy, and ordered his maſter to bring him along-ſide of the French admiral, who commanded in perſon on board the Soleil Royal, a ſhip mounted with 80 cannon, and provided with a complement of 1200 men. When the pilot remonſtrated that he could not obey his command, without the moſt imminent riſque of running upon a ſhoal, the brave veteran replied, 'you have done your duty in ſhowing the danger; now you are to comply with my order, and lay me along-ſide the Soleil Royal.' His wiſh was gratified: the Royal George ranged up with the French admiral. The Theſée, another large ſhip of the enemy, running up between the two commanders, ſuſtained the fire that was reſerved for the Soleil Royal; but in returning the firſt broadſide foundered, in conſequence of the high ſea that entered her lower dec-ports, and filled her with water. Nothwithſtanding the boiſterous weather, a great number of ſhips on both ſides fought with equal fury and dubious ſucceſs, till about four in the afternoon, when the Formidable ſtruc her colours. The Superbe ſhared the fate of the Theſée in going to the bottom. The Hero hauled down her colours in token of ſubmiſſion, and dropped anchor; but the wind was ſo high, that no boat could be ſent to take poſſeſſion. By this time day-light began to fail, and the greater part of the French fleet eſcaped under cover of the darkneſs. Night approaching, the wind blowing with augmented violence on a lee-ſhore, and the Britiſh ſquadron being entangled among unknown ſhoals and iſlands, ſir Edward Hawke made the ſignal for anchoring to the weſtward of the ſmall iſland Dumet; and here the fleet remained all night in a very dangerous riding, alarmed by the fury of the ſtorm, and the inceſſant firing of guns of diſtreſs, without their knowing whether it proceeded from friend or enemy. The Soleil Royal had, under favour of the night, anchored alſo in the midſt of the Britiſh ſquadron; but at day-break M. de Conflans ordered her cable to be cut, and ſhe drove a-ſhore to the weſtward of Crozie. The Engliſh admiral immediately made ſignal to the Eſſex to ſlip cable, and purſue her; and, in obeying this order, ſhe ran unfortunately on a ſand-bank called Lefour, where the Reſolution, another ſhip of the Britiſh ſquadron, was already grounded. Here they were both irrecoverably loſt, in ſpite of all the aſſiſtance that could be given: but all their men and part of the ſtores, were ſaved, and the wrecs ſet on fire by order of the admiral. He likewiſe detached the Portland, Chatham, and Vengeance to deſtroy the Soleil Royal, which was burned by her own people, before the Engliſh ſhips could approach; but they arrived time enough to reduce the Hero to aſhes on the Lefour, where ſhe had been alſo ſtranded; and the Juſte, another of their great ſhips periſhed in the mouth of the Loire. The admiral perceiving ſeven large ſhips of the enemy riding at anchor between Point-Penvas and the mouth of the river Vilaine, made the ſignal to weigh, in order to attac them, but the fury of the ſtorm increaſed to ſuch a degree, that he was obliged to remain at anchor, and even order the top-gallant-maſts to be ſtruc. In the mean time, the French ſhips being lightened of their cannon, their officers took advantage of the flood, and a more moderate gale under the land, to enter the Vilaine, where they lay within half a mile of the entrance, protected by ſome occaſional batteries erected on the ſhore, and by two large frigates moored acroſs the mouth of the harbour. Thus they were effectually ſecured from any attempts of ſmall veſſels; and as for large ſhips, there was not water ſufficient to float them within fighting diſtance of the enemy. On the whole, this battle, in which a very inconſiderable number of lives was loſt, may be conſidered as one of the moſt perilous and important actions that ever happened in any war between the two nations; for it not only defeated the projected invaſion, which had hung menacing ſo long over the apprehenſions of Great-Britain; but it gave the finiſhing blow to the naval power of France, which was totally diſabled from undertaking any thing of conſequence in the ſequel[e]. By this time, indeed, Thurot had eſcaped from Dunkirk, and directed his courſe to the North-ſea, whither he was followed by commodore Boys, who nevertheleſs was diſappointed in his purſuit; but the fate of that enterprizing adventurer falls under the annals of the enſuing year, among the tranſactions of which it ſhall be recorded. As for ſir Edward Hawke, he continued cruiſing off the coaſt of Bretagne for a conſiderable time after the victory he had obtained, taking particular care to bloc up the mouth of the river Vilaine, that the ſeven French ſhips might not eſcape and join M. Conflans, who made ſhift to reach Rochefort with the ſhattered remains of his ſquadron. Indeed, this ſervice became ſuch a conſiderable object in the eyes of the Britiſh miniſtry, that a large fleet was maintained upon this coaſt, apparently for no other purpoſe, during a whole year, and, after all, the enemy eluded their vigilance. Sir Edward Hawke, having undergone a long and dangerous conflict with tempeſtuous weather, was at length recalled, and preſented to his ſovereign, who gratified him with a conſiderable penſion, for the courage and conduct he had ſo often and ſo long diſplayed in the ſervice of his country; and his extraordinary merit was afterwards honoured with the approbation of the parliament. The people of France were ſo diſpirited by the defeat of their army at Minden, and the diſaſter of their ſquadron at Lagos, that the miniſtry at Verſailles thought proper to conceal the extent of their laſt misfortune under a paliating detain publiſhed in the Gazette of Paris, as a letter from M. Conflans to the count de St. Florentine, ſecretary of the marine. In this partial miſrepreſentation their admiral was made to affirm, that the Britiſh fleet conſiſted of 40 ſhips of the line of battle, beſides frigates; that the Soleil Royal had obliged the Royal George to ſhare off; that the ſeven ſhips which retreated into the river Vilaine had received very little damage, and would be ſoon repaired; and that, by the junction of Bompart's ſquadron, he ſhould be ſoon able to give a good account of the Engliſh admiral. Theſe tumid aſſertions, ſo void of truth, are not to be imputed to an illiberal ſpirit of vain glory, ſo much as to a political deſign of extenuating the national calamity, and ſupporting the ſpirit of the people.

The alarm of the French invaſion, which was thus ſo happily fruſtrated, not only diſturbed the quiet of Great-Britain, but alſo diffuſed itſelf to the kingdom of Ireland, where it was productive of ſome public diſorder. In the latter end of October the two houſes of parliament, aſſembled at Dublin, received a formal meſſage from the duke of Bedford, lord-lieutenant of that kingdom, to the following effect: That, by a letter from the ſecretary of ſtate, written by his majeſty's expreſs command, it appeared that France, far from reſigning her plan of invaſion, on account of the diſaſter that befel her Toulon ſquadron, was more and more confirmed in her purpoſe, and even inſtigated by deſpair itſelf, to attempt at all hazards the only reſource ſhe ſeemed to have left for thwarting, by a diverſion at home, the meaſures of England abroad in proſecuting a war which hitherto opened in all parts of the world, ſo unfavourable a proſpect to the views of French ambition: that in caſe the body of French troops, amounting to 18,000 men, under the command of the duc d'Aiguillon, aſſembled at Vannes, where alſo a ſufficient number of tranſports was prepared, ſhould be able to elude the Britiſh ſquadron, Ireland would, in all probability, be one of their chief objects; his grace thought it, therefore, incumbent upon him, in a matter of ſuch high importance to the welfare of that kingdom, to communicate this intelligence to the Iriſh parliament. He told them his majeſty would make no doubt but that the zeal of his faithful proteſtant ſubjects in that kingdom had been already ſufficiently quickened by the repeated accounts received of the enemy's dangerous deſigns, and actual preparations made at a vaſt expence, in order to invade the ſeveral parts of the Britiſh dominions. He gave them to underſtand he had received his ſovereign's commands to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to animate and excite his loyal people of Ireland to exert their well-known zeal and ſpirit in ſupport of his majeſty's government, and in defence of all that was dear to them, by timely preparation to reſiſt and fruſtrate any attempts of the enemy to diſturb the quiet and ſhake the ſecurity of this kingdom: he, therefore in the ſtrongeſt manner, recommended it to them to manifeſt, upon this occaſion, that zeal for the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, and that affection for his majeſty's perſon and government, by which the parliament of that nation had been ſo often diſtinguiſhed. Immediately after this meſſage was communicated, the houſe of commons unanimouſly reſolved to preſent an addreſs to the lord-lieutenant, thanking his grace for the care and concern he had ſhown for the ſafety of Ireland in having imparted intelligence of ſo great importance; deſiring him to make uſe of ſuch means as ſhould appear to him the moſt effectual for the ſecurity and defence of the kingdom; and aſſuring him, that the houſe would make good whatever expence ſhould be neceſſarily incurred for that purpoſe. This intimation, and the ſteps that were taken in conſequence of it for the defence of Ireland, produced ſuch apprehenſions and diſtraction among the people of that kingdom, as had well nigh proved fatal to the public credit. In the firſt tranſports of popular fear, there was ſuch an extraordinary run upon the banks of Dublin, that ſeveral conſiderable bankers were obliged to ſtop payment; and the circulation was in danger of being ſuddenly ſtagnated, when the lord-lieutenant, the members of both houſes of parliament, the lord-mayor, aldermen, merchants, and principal traders of Dublin, engaged in an aſſociation to ſupport public credit, by taking the notes of bankers in payment: a reſolution which effectually anſwered the purpoſe intended.

[e] During the war, the Engliſh had already taken and deſtroyed 27 French ſhips of the line, and 31 frigates: two of their great ſhips and four frigates periſhed; ſo that their whole loſs in that particular, amounted to 64; whereas the loſs of Great-Britain did not exceed ſeven ſail of the line, and five frigates. It may be eaſily conceived how the French marine, at firſt greatly inferior to the naval power of Britain, muſt have been affected by this dreadful balance to its prejudice.

Howſoever the court of Verſailles might have flattered itſelf that their invading army would in Ireland be joined by a great number of the natives, in all probability it would have been diſappointed in this hope, had their purpoſed deſcent even been carried into execution, for no ſigns of diſaffection to the reigning family appeared at this juncture. On the contrary, the wealthy individuals of the Romiſh perſuaſion offered to accommodate the government with large ſums of money, in caſe of neceſſity, to ſupport the preſent eſtabliſhment againſt all its enemies; and the Roman catholics of the city of Cork, in a body, preſented an addreſs to the lord-lieutenant, expreſſing their loyalty in the warmeſt terms of aſſurance. After having congratulated his grace on the unparalleled ſucceſſes which had attended his majeſty's arms, and expreſſed their ſenſe of the king's paternal tenderneſs for his kingdom of Ireland, they acknowledged, with the deepeſt ſenſe of gratitude, that protection and indulgence they had enjoyed under his majeſty's mild and auſpicious reign. They profeſſed the warmeſt indignation at the threatened invaſion of the kingdom, by an enemy, who, grown deſperate from repeated defeats, might poſſibly make that attempt as a laſt effort, vainly flattered with the imaginary hope of aſſiſtance in Ireland, from the former attachments of their deluded predeceſſors. They aſſured his grace, in the moſt ſolemn manner, that ſuch ſchemes were altogether inconſiſtent with their principles and intentions; that they would, to the utmoſt exertion of their abilities, with their lives and fortunes, join in the defence and ſupport of his majeſty's royal perſon and government againſt all invaders whatſoever: that they ſhould be always ready to concur in ſuch meaſures, and to act ſuch parts in defence of the kingdom, in common with the reſt of his majeſty's ſubjects, as his grace in his great wiſdom ſhould be pleaſed to appoint; and think themſelves particularly happy to be under the direction and command of ſo known an aſſertor of liberty, ſuch an important and diſtinguiſhed governor. Finally, they expreſſed the moſt earneſt wiſh, that his majeſty's arms might be crowned with ſuch a continuance of ſucceſs as ſhould enable him to defeat the devices of all his enemies, and obtain a ſpeedy and honourable peace. This cordial addreſs, which was tranſmitted to the earl of Shannon, and by him preſented to the duke of Bedford, muſt have been very agreeable to the government at ſuch a critical conjuncture.

Although no traces of diſaffection to his majeſty's family appeared on this trying occaſion, it muſt nevertheleſs be acknowledged that a ſpirit of diſſatisfaction broke out with extraordinary violence among the populace of Dublin. The preſent lord-lieutenant was not remarkably popular in his adminiſtration. He had beſtowed one place of conſiderable importance upon a gentleman whoſe perſon was obnoxious to many people in that kingdom, and perhaps failed in that affability and condeſcenſion which a free and ferocious nation expects to find in the character of him to whoſe rule they are ſubjected. Whether the offence taken at his deportment had created enemies to his perſon, or the nation in general began to entertain doubts and jealouſies of the government's deſigns; certain it is, great pains were taken to propogate a belief among the lower ſort of people, that an union would ſoon be effected between Great-Britain and Ireland; in which caſe this laſt kingdom would be deprived of its parliament and independency, and be ſubjected to the ſame taxes that are levied upon the people of England. This notion inflamed the populace to ſuch a degree, that they aſſembled in a prodigious multitude, broke into the houſe of lords, inſulted the peers, ſeated an old woman on the throne, and ſearched for the journals, which, had they been found, they would have committed to the flames. Not content with this outrage, they compelled the members of both houſes whom they met in the ſtreets to take an oath that they would never conſent to ſuch an union, or give any vote contrary to the true intereſt of Ireland. Divers coaches belonging to obnoxious perſons were deſtroyed, and their horſes killed; and a gibbet was erected for one gentleman in particular, who narrowly eſcaped the ungovernable rage of thoſe riotous inſurgents. A body of horſe and infantry were drawn out on this occaſion, in order to over-awe the multitude, which at night diſperſed of itſelf. Next day addreſſes to the lord-lieutenant were agreed to by both houſes of parliament, and a committee of enquiry appointed, that the ringleaders of the tumult might be diſcovered, and brought to condign puniſhment.

When the miniſtry of England received the firſt advice that M. Thurot had eſcaped from Dunkirk with a ſmall ſquadron of armed ſhips, having on board a body of land-troops, deſigned for a private expedition on the coaſt of Scotland or Ireland, expreſſes were immediately diſpatched to the commanding officers of the forces in North-Britain, with orders to put the forts along the coaſt of that kingdom, in the beſt poſture of defence; and to hold every thing in readineſs to repel the enemy, in caſe they ſhould attempt a deſcent. In conſequence of theſe inſtructions, beacons were erected for the immediate communication of intelligence; places of rendezvous appointed for the regular troops and militia; and ſtrict orders iſſued that no officer ſhould abſent himſelf from his duty, on any pretence whatever. The greateſt encomium that can be given to the character of this partizan, is on account of the alarm which the ſailing of his puny armament ſpread through the whole extent of ſuch a powerful kingdom, whoſe fleets covered the ocean. Perhaps Thurot's career would have been ſooner ſtopped, had commodore Boys been victualled for a longer cruiſe; but this commander was obliged to put into Leith for a ſupply of proviſions, at the very time when Thurot was ſeen hovering on the coaſt near Aberdeen; and before the Engliſh ſquadron was provided for a proſecution of the cruiſe, the other had taken ſhelter at Gottenburg, in Sweden.

Having finiſhed the detail of the actions achieved in the European ſeas by the naval force of Great-Britain within the compaſs of the preſent year, we ſhall now proceed to record the exploits of the Britiſh arms within the tropicks, and particularly the expedition to Martinique and Guadaloupe, which is ſaid to have ſucceeded even beyond the expectation of the miniſtry. A plan had been formed for improving the ſucceſs of the preceding year in North-America, by carrying the Britiſh arms up the river St. Laurence, and beſieging Quebeck, the capital of Canada. The armament employed againſt the French iſlands of Martinique and Guadaloupe conſtituted part of this deſign, inaſmuch as the troops embarked on that expedition were, in caſe of a miſcarriage at Martinique, intended to re-enforce the Britiſh army in North-America, which was juſtly conſidered as the chief ſeat of the war. What hope of ſucceſs the adminiſtration conceived from an attempt upon Martinique may be gueſſed from the ſtate of that iſland, as it appeared in a memorial preſented by the French king's lieutenants of its ſeveral diſtricts, to the general of the French iſlands, in conſequence of an order iſſued in November, for holding them in readineſs to march and defend the iſland from the Engliſh, of whoſe deſign they were appriſed. They repreſented, that the trade with the Dutch was become their ſole dependence; that they could expect no ſuccour from Europe, by which they had been abandoned ever ſince the commencement of the war; that the traders veſted with the privilege of traffic-ing among them had abuſed the intention of the general, and, inſtead of being of ſervice to the colony, had fixed an arbitrary price for all the proviſions which they brought in, as well as for the commodities which they exported; of conſequence, the former was valued at as high a price as their avarice could exact, and the latter ſunk as low in value as their own ſelfiſh hearts could conceive: that the colony for two months had been deſtitute of all kinds of proviſions; the commodities of the planters lay upon their hands; and their negroes were in danger of periſhing through hunger; a circumſtance that excited the apprehenſion of the moſt dreadful conſequences; as to ſlaves, half-ſtarved, all kinds of bondage were equal; and people reduced to ſuch a ſituation were often driven to deſpair, ſeeking in anarchy and confuſion a remedy from the evils by which they were oppreſſed: that the beſt provided of the inhabitants laboured under the want of the common neceſſaries of life; and others had not ſo much as a grain of ſalt in their houſes: that there was an irreparable ſcarcity of ſlaves to cultivate their land; and the planters were reduced to the neceſſity of killing their cattle to ſupport the lives of thoſe who remained alive; ſo that the mills were no longer worked, and the inhabitants conſumed beforehand what ought to be reſerved for their ſuſtenance, in caſe of being blocked up by the enemy. They deſired, therefore, that the general would ſuppreſs the permiſſions granted to particular merchants, and admit neutral veſſels freely into their ports, that they might trade with the coloniſts unmoleſted and unreſtrained. They obſerved, that the citadel of Port-Royal ſeemed the principal object on which the ſafety and defence of the country depended; as the loſs of it would be neceſſarily attended with the reduction of the whole iſland: they, therefore, adviſed that this fort ſhould be properly provided with every thing neceſſary for its ſafety and defence; and that magazines of proviſion as well as ammunition ſhould be eſtabliſhed in different quarters of the iſland. This remonſtrance plainly proves that the iſland was wholly unprepared to repel the meditated invaſion, and juſtifies the plan adopted by the miniſtry of Great-Britain. The regular troops of Martinique conſiſted of about twenty independent companies greatly defective in point of number. The militia was compoſed of burghers and planters diſtreſſed and diſſatisfied, mingled with a parcel of wretched negroe ſlaves, groaning under the moſt intolerable miſery, from whence they could have no hope of deliverance but by a ſpeedy change of maſters; their magazines were empty, and their fortifications out of repair.

Such was the ſtate of the Martinique, when the inhabitants every day expected a viſit from the Britiſh armament, whoſe progreſs we ſhall now relate. On the 12th day of November, in the preceding year, captain Hughes ſailed from St. Helen's, with eight ſail of the line, one frigate, four bomb-ketches, and a fleet of tranſports, having on board ſix regiments of infantry, and a detachment of artillery, beſides 800 marines diſtributed among the ſhips of war, this whole force being under the command of major-general Hopſon, an old experienced officer, aſſiſted by major-general Barrington, the colonels Armiger and Haldane, the lieutenant-colonels Trapaud and Clavering, acting in capacity of brigadiers. After a voyage of ſeven weeks and three days, the fleet arrived at Barbadoes and anchored in Carliſle-bay, where they joined commodore Moore, appointed by his majeſty to command the united ſquadrons, amounting to 10 ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and bomb-ketches. Ten days were employed in ſupplying the fleet with wood and water, in waiting for the hoſpital ſhip, in reviews, reembarkations, councils of war, aſſemblies of the council belonging to the iſland, in iſſuing proclamations, and beating up for volunteers. At length, every great ſhip being re-enforced with 40 negroes, to be employed in drawing the artillery; and the troops, which did not exceed 5800 men, being joined by 200 highlanders, belonging to the ſecond battalion of the regiment commanded by lord John Murray in North-America, who were brought as recruits from Scotland, under convoy of the ſhip Ludlow-Caſtle, the whole armament ſailed from Carliſle-bay on the 13th day of January: but by this time the troops, unaccuſtomed to a hot climate, were conſiderably weakened and reduced by fevers, diarrhœas, the ſcurvy and the ſmall-pox; which laſt diſeaſe had unhappily broke out amongſt the tranſports. Next morning the ſquadron diſcovered the iſland of Martinique, which was the place of its deſtination. The chief fortification of Martinique was the citadel of Port-Royal, a regular fort, garriſoned by four companies that did not exceed the number of 150 men, 36 bombardiers, 80 Swiſs, and 14 officers, One hundred barrels of beef conſtituted their whole ſtore of proviſion; and they were deſtitute of all other neceſſaries. They were almoſt wholly unprovided with water in the ciſterns, with ſpare carriages for their cannon, match, wadding, and langrage: they had but a ſmall ſtoc of other ammunition, and the walls were in many parts decayed. The only preparations they had made for receiving the Engliſh were ſome paltry entrenchments thrown up at St. Pierre, and a place called Caſdenavires, where they imagined the deſcent would probably be attempted. On the 15th day of the month the Britiſh ſquadron entered the great bay of Port-Royal, ſome of the ſhips being expoſed to the ſhot of a battery erected on the iſle de Ranieres, a little iſland about half way up the bay. At their firſt appearance, the Floriſſent of 74 guns, which had been ſo roughly handled by captain Tyrrel, in the Buckingham, then lying under the guns of Fort-Negro, along with two frigates, turned up under the citadel, and came to an anchor in the Carenage, behind the fortification. One frigate, called the Veſtal, under favour of the night, made her eſcape through the tranſports, and directed her courſe for Europe; where ſhe was taken by captain Hood, as we have already related. Next day three ſhips of the line were ordered to attac Fort-Negro, a battery at the diſtance of three miles from the citadel, which being mounted with ſeven guns only, was ſoon ſilenced, and immediately poſſeſſed by a detachment of marines and ſailors; who being landed in flat-bottomed boats, clambered up the roc, and entered through the embraſures with their bayonets fixed; here, however, they met with no reſiſtance. The enemy had abandoned the fort with precipitation. The Britiſh colours were immediately hoiſted, and ſentinels of marines poſted upon the parapet. The next care was to ſpike and diſable the cannon, break the carriages, and deſtroy the powder which they found in the magazine: nevertheleſs, the detachment was ordered to keep poſſeſſion of the battery. This ſervice being ſucceſsfully performed, three ſhips were ſent to reduce the other battery at Caſdenavires, which conſiſted only of four guns, and theſe were ſoon rendered unſerviceable. The French troops, re-enforced with militia which had been detached from the citadel to oppoſe the diſembarkation, perceiving the whole Britiſh ſquadron, and all the tranſports, already within the bay, and Fort-Negro occupied by the marines, retired to Port-Royal, leaving the beach open; ſo that the Engliſh troops were landed without oppoſition, and, being formed, advanced into the country towards Fort-Negro, in the neighbourhood of which they lay all night upon their arms; while the fleet, which had been galled by bomb-ſhells from the citadel, ſhifted their ſtation, and ſtood further up the bay. By ten next day the Engliſh officers had brought up ſome field-pieces to an eminence, and ſcoured the woods, from whence the troops had been greatly annoyed by the ſmall ſhot of the enemy during the beſt part of the night, and all that morning. At noon the Britiſh forces advanced in order towards the hill that overlooked the town and citadel of Port-Royal, and ſuſtained a troubleſome fire from enemies they could not ſee; for the French malitia were entirely covered by the woods and buſhes. This eminence, called the Morne Tortueſon, though the moſt important poſt of the whole iſland, was neglected by the general of Martinique, who had reſolved to blow up the fortifications of the citadel: but luckily for the iſlanders he had not prepared the materials for this operation, which muſt have been attended with the immediate deſtruction of the capital, and indeed of the whole country. Some of the inferior officers, knowing the importance of the Morne Tortueſon, reſolved to defend that poſt with a body of the militia, which was re-enforced by the garriſons of Fort-Negro and Caſdenavires, as well as by ſome ſoldiers detached from the Floriſſant: but, notwithſtanding all their endeavours, as they were entirely unprovided with cannon, extremely defective in point of diſcipline, diſpirited by the puſillanimity of their governor, and in a great meaſure diſconcerted by the general conſternation that prevailed among the inhabitants, in all probability they could not have withſtood a ſpirited and well-conducted attac by regular forces. About two o'clock general Hopſon thought proper to deſiſt from his attempt. He gave the commodore to underſtand that he could not maintain his ground, unleſs the ſquadron would ſupply him with heavy cannon, landed near the town of Port-Royal, at a ſavannah where the boats muſt have been greatly expoſed to the fire of the enemy, or aſſiſt him in attacking the citadel by ſea, while he ſhould make his approaches by land. Both theſe expedients[f] being deemed impracticable by a council of war, the troops were recalled from their advanced poſts, and reembarked in the evening, without any conſiderable moleſtation from the enemy. Their attempt on the Morne Tortueſon had coſt them ſeveral men, including two officers killed or wounded in the attac; and in revenge for this loſs, they burned the ſugar-canes, and deſolated the country in their retreat. The inhabitants of Martinique could hardly credit the teſtimony of their own ſenſes, when they ſaw themſelves thus delivered from all their fears, at a time when they were overwhelmed with terror and confuſion; when the principal individuals among them had reſigned all thought of further reſiſtance, and were actually aſſembled at the public hall in Port-Royal, to ſend deputies to the Engliſh general, with propoſals of capitulation and ſurrender.

The majority of the Britiſh officers, who conſtitutes a council of war held for this purpoſe[g], having given their opinion, that it might be for his majeſty's ſervice to make an attac upon St. Pierre, the fleet proceeded to that part of the iſland, and entered the bay on the 19th. The commodore told the general, that he made no doubt of being able to reduce the town of St. Pierre; but as the ſhips might be diſabled in the attac, ſo as not to be in a condition to proceed immediately on any material ſervice; as the troops might be reduced in their numbers, ſo as to be incapable of future attacs; and as the reduction of the iſland of Guadaloupe would be of great benefit to the ſugar colonies, mr. Moore propoſed that the armament ſhould immediately proceed to that iſland: and the general agreed to the propoſal. The reaſons produced on this occaſion are, we apprehend, ſuch as may be urged againſt every operation of war. Certain it is, no conqueſt can be attempted, either by ſea or land, without expoſing the ſhips and troops to a poſſibility of being diſabled and diminiſhed; and the ſame poſſibility militated as ſtrongly againſt an attempt upon Guadaloupe, as it could poſſibly diſcourage the attac of St. Pierre. Beſides, Martinique was an object of greater importance[h] than Guadaloupe; as being the principal place poſſeſſed by the French in thoſe ſeas, and that to which the operations of the armament were expreſly limited by the inſtructions received from the miniſtry. St. Pierre was a place of conſiderable commerce; and at that very juncture above 40 ſail of merchant-ſhips lay at anchor in the bay. The town was defended by a citadel regularly fortified, but at that time poorly garriſoned; and ſo ſituated as to be acceſſible to the fire of the whole ſquadron: for the ſhore was bold, and the water ſufficient to float any ſhip of the line. Before the reſolution of proceeding to Guadaloupe was taken, the commodore had ordered the bay to be ſounded, and directed the Rippon to advance, and ſilence a battery ſituated a mile and a half to the northward of St. Pierre. Accordingly, captain Jekyll, who commanded that ſhip, ſtood in, and anchored cloſe to the ſhore, attacked it with ſuch impetuoſity, that in a few minutes it was abandoned. At the ſame time the Rippon was expoſed to the fire of three other batteries, from which ſhe received conſiderable damage both in her hull and rigging; and was in great danger of running a-ground, when orders were given to tow her out of danger.

The whole armament having abandoned the deſign on Martinique, directed their courſe to Guadaloupe, another of the Caribbee iſlands, lying at the diſtance of 30 leagues to the weſtward, about 15 leagues in length, and 12 in breadth; divided into two parts by a ſmall channel, which the inhabitants croſs in a ferry-boat. The weſtern diviſion is known by the name of Baſſeterre; and here the metropolis ſtands, defended by the citadel, and other fortifications. The eaſtern part, called Grandterre, is deſtitute of freſh water, which abounds in the other diviſion, and is defended by Fort-Louis, with a redoubt which commands the road in the diſtrict of Goſier. The gut, or canal, that ſeparates the two parts is diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of the Salt River, having a road or bay at each end; namely, the great Cul de Sac, and the ſmall Cul de Sac. Guadaloupe is encumbered with high mountains and precipices, to which the inhabitants uſed to convey their valuable effects in time of danger: but here are alſo beautiful plains watered by brooks and rivers, which fertiliſe the ſoil, enabling it to produce a great quantity of ſugar, cotton, indigo, tobacco, and caſſia; beſides plenty of rice, potatoes, all kinds of pulſe, and fruit peculiar to the iſland. The country is populous and flouriſhing, and the government comprehends two ſmaller iſlands, called All-Saints, and Deſeada, which appear at a ſmall diſtance from the coaſt, on the eaſtern ſide of the iſland. The Britiſh ſquadron having arrived at Baſſaterre, it was reſolved to make a general attac by ſea upon the citadel, the town, and other batteries by which it was defended. A diſpoſition being made for this purpoſe, the large ſhips took their reſpective ſtations next morning, which was the 23d day of January. At nine, the Lion, commanded by captain Trelawny, began the engagement againſt a battery of nine guns; and the reſt of the fleet continued to place themſelves a-breaſt of the other batteries and the citadel, which mounted 46 cannon, beſides two mortars. The action in a little time became general, and was maintained on both ſides for ſeveral hours with great vivacity, while the commodore, who had ſhifted his pendant into the Woolwich frigate, kept aloof without gun-ſhot, that he might be the more diſengaged to view the ſtate of the battle[i], and give his orders with the greater deliberation. This expedient of an admiral's removing his flag, and retiring from the action while his own ſhip is engaged, however conſonant to reaſon, we do not remember to have ſeen practiſed upon any other occaſion, except in one inſtance, at Carthagena, where ſir Chaloner Ogle quitted his own ſhip, when ſhe was ordered to ſtand in, and cannonade the fort of Boca-Chica. In this preſent attac, all the ſea commanders behaved with extraordinary ſpirit and reſolution, particularly the captains Leſlie, Burnet, Gayton, Jekyll, Trelawny, and Shuldam; who, in the hotteſt tumult of the action, diſtinguiſhed themſelves equally by their courage, impetuoſity, and deliberation. About five in the afternoon the fire of the citadel ſlackened. The Burford and Berwick were driven out to ſea; ſo that captain Shulham, in the Panther was unſuſtained; and two batteries played upon the Rippon, captain Jekyll, who, by two in the afternoon, ſilenced the guns of one, called the Morne-rouge; but at the ſame time could not prevent his ſhip from running a-ground. The enemy perceiving her diſaſter, aſſembled in great numbers on the hill, and lined the trenches, from whence they poured in a ſevere fire of muſquetry. The militia afterwards brought up a cannon of 18 pound ball, and for two hours raked her fore and aft with conſiderable effect: nevertheleſs, captain Jekyll returned the fire with equal courage and perſeverance, though his people dropped on every ſide, until his grape-ſhot and wadding was expended, and all his rigging cut to pieces; to crown his misfortune, a box, containing 900 cartridges blew up on the poop, and ſet the ſhip on fire; which, however, was ſoon extinguiſhed. In the mean time, the captain threw out a ſignal of diſtreſs[k]; to which no regard was paid, till captain Leſlie, of the Briſtol, coming from ſea, and obſerving his ſituation, ran in between the Rippon and the battery; and engaged with ſuch impetuoſity, as made an immediate diverſion in favour of captain Jekyll, whoſe ſhip remained a-ground, notwithſtanding all the aſſiſtance that could be given, till midnight, when ſhe floated, and eſcaped from the very jaws of deſtruction. At ſeven in the evening, all the other large ſhips having ſilenced the guns to which they had been reſpectively oppoſed, joined the reſt of the fleet. The four bombs being anchored near the ſhore, began to ply the town with ſhells and carcaſſes; ſo that in a little time the houſes were in flames, the magazines of gunpowder blew up with the moſt terrible exploſion; and about 10 o'clock the whole place blazed out in one general conflagration. Next day, at two in the afternoon, the fleet came to an anchor in the road of Baſſeterre, where they found the hulls of divers ſhips which the enemy had ſet on fire at their approach: ſeveral ſhips turned out, and en-

[f] The commodore offered to land the cannon on the other ſide of Point-Negro, at a place equally near the road from the Engliſh army to Port-Royal, and even cauſe them to be drawn up by ſeamen, without giving the troops the leaſt trouble. But this offer was not accepted. General Hopſon afterwards declared that he did not underſtand mr. Moore's meſſage in the ſenſe which it was meant to imply.

[g] The commodore did not attend at this council: it was convoked to deliberate upon the opinion of the chief engineer, who thought they ſhould make another landing to the ſouthward of the Carenage. In this caſe, the pilots declared it would be extremely difficult, if not impracticable, for the fleet to keep up a communication with the army.

[h] Only as being the ſeat of government; for Guadaloupe makes a much greater quantity of ſugar, and equipped a much greater number of privateers, with the aſſiſtance of the Dutch of St. Euſtatia, ſituated in its neighbourhood.

[i] He ſhifted his broad pendant on board the Woolwich, as well to direct and keep the tranſports together in a proper poſture for the landing of the troops, as to cover the diſembarkation, and alſo to conſult proper meaſures with the general, who ſaw the neceſſity of mr. Moore being with him; and requeſted that he, with the other general officers and engineers, might be admitted on board the Woolwich, in order to conſult, and take the earlieſt opportunity of landing the troops, as the ſervice neceſſarily required.

[k] In all probability it was not perceived by the commodore.

deavoured to eſcape, but were intercepted and taken by the Engliſh ſquadron. At five the troops landed without oppoſition, and took poſſeſſion of the town and citadel, which they found entirely abandoned. They learned from a Genoeſe deſerter, that the regular troops of the iſland conſiſted of five companies only, the number of the whole not exceeding 100 men; and that they had laid a train to blow up the powder magazine in the citadel: but had been obliged to retreat with ſuch precipitation, as did not permit them to execute this deſign. The train was immediately cut off, and the magazine ſecured. The nails with which they had ſpiked up their cannon were drilled out by the matroſſes; and in the mean time the Britiſh colours were hoiſted on the parapet. Part of the troops took poſſeſſion of an advantageous poſt on an eminence, and part entered the town, which ſtill continued burning with great violence. In the morning at day-break, the enemy appeared, to the number of 2000, about four miles from the town, as if they intended to throw up entrenchments in the neighbourhood of a houſe where the governor had fixed his head-quarters, declaring he would maintain his ground to the laſt extremity. To this reſolution, indeed, he was encouraged by the nature of the ground, and the neighbourhood of a paſs called the Dos d'Ane, a cleft through a mountainous ridge, opening a communication with Capeſterre, a more level and beautiful part of the iſland. The aſcent from Baſſeterre to this paſs was ſo very ſteep, and the way ſo broken and interrupted by rocs and gullies, that there was no proſpect of attacking it with ſucceſs, except at the firſt landing, when the inhabitants were under the dominion of a panic. They very ſoon recovered their ſpirits and recollection, aſſembled and fortified themſelves among the hills, armed and arrayed their negroes, and affected to hold the invaders at defiance. A flag of truce being ſent, with offers of terms to their governor, the chevalier d'Etreil, he rejected them in a letter, with which his ſubſequent conduct but ill agreed[l]. Indeed from the beginning, his deportment had been ſuch as gave a very unfavourable impreſſion of his character. When the Britiſh ſquadron advanced to the attac, inſtead of viſiting in perſon the citadel and the batteries, in order to encourage and animate his people by his exhortation and example, he retired out of the reach of danger to a diſtant plantation, where he remained a tame ſpectator of the deſtruction in which his principal town and citadel were involved. Next morning when he ought to have exerted himſelf in preventing the diſembarkation of the Engliſh troops, who had a difficult ſhore and violent ſurf to ſurmount, and when he might have defended the entrenchments and lines which had been made to oppoſe their landing; he abandoned all theſe advantages, and took ſhelter among the mountains that were deemed inacceſſible.

But, howſoever deficient the governor might have been in the article of courage, certain it is the inhabitants behaved with great ſpirit and activity in defence of their country. They continually harraſſed the ſcouring detachments, by firing upon them from woods and ſugar plantations, which laſt the Engliſh burned about their ears in reſentment. Their armed negroes were very expert in this kind of buſh-fighting. The natives or militia appeared in conſiderable parties, and even encountered detached bodies of the Britiſh army. A lady of maſculine courage, whoſe name was Ducharmey, having armed her ſlaves, they made ſeveral bold attempts upon an advanced poſt, occupied by major Melville, and threw up entrenchments upon a hill oppoſite to the ſtation of this officer, who had all along ſignalized himſelf by his uncommon intrepidity, vigilance, and conduct. At length the works of this virago were ſtormed by a regular detachment, which, after an obſtinate and dangerous conflict, entered the entrenchment ſword in hand, and burned the houſes and plantations. Some of the enemy were killed, and a great number taken. Of the Engliſh detachment 12 ſoldiers were ſlain, and 30 wounded, including three ſubaltern officers, one of whom loſt his arm. The greateſt body of the enemy always appeared at the governor's head-quarters, where they had raiſed a redoubt, and thrown up entrenchments. From theſe a conſiderable detachment advanced on the 6th day of February, in the morning, towards the citadel, and fell in with an Engliſh party, whom they engaged with great vivacity; but, after a ſhort though warm diſpute, they were obliged to retire, with ſome loſs. Without all doubt, the inhabitants of Guadaloupe purſued the moſt ſenſible plan that could poſſibly have been projected for their own ſafety. Inſtead of hazarding a general engagement againſt regular troops, in which they could have no proſpect of ſucceſs, they reſolved to weary them out, by maintaining a kind of petty war in ſeparate parties, to alarm and harraſs the Engliſh with hard duty in a ſultry climate, where they were but indifferently ſupplied with proviſion and refreſhment. Nor were their hopes in this particular diſappointed. Both the army and the navy were invaded with fevers and other diſeaſes, epidemical in thoſe hot countries; and the regimental hoſpitals were ſo crowded, that it was judged convenient to ſend 500 ſic men to the iſland of Antigua, where they might be properly attended.

In the mean time, the reduction of the iſlanders on the ſide of Guadaloupe appearing more and more impracticable, the general reſolved to transfer the ſeat of war to the eaſtern and more fertile part of the iſland, called Grandterre, which, as we have already obſerved, was defended by a ſtrong battery, called Fort-Louis. In purſuance of this determination, the great ſhips were ſet round to Grandterre, in order to reduce this fortification, which they accordingly attacked on the 13th day of February. After a ſevere cannonading, which laſted ſix hours, a body of marines being landed, with the Highlanders[m], they drove the enemy from their entrenchments ſword in hand, and, taking poſſeſſion of the fort, hoiſted the Engliſh colours. In a few days after this exploit, general Hopſon dying at Baſſeterre, the chief command devolved on general Barrington, who reſolved to proſecute the final reduction of the iſland with vigour and diſpatch. As one ſtep towards this conqueſt, the commodore ordered two ſhips of war to cruiſe off the iſland of St. Euſtatia, and prevent the Dutch traders from aſſiſting the natives of Guadaloupe, whom they had hitherto conſtantly ſupplied with proviſions, ſince they retired to the mountains. General Barrington, on the very firſt day of his command, ordered the troops who were encamped to ſtrike their tents and huts, that the enemy might imagine he intended to remain in this quarter; but in a few days the batteries in and about Baſſeterre were blown up and deſtroyed, the detachments recalled from the advanced poſts, and the whole army re-embarked, except one regiment, with a detachment of artillery, left in garriſon at the citadel, the command of which was beſtowed on colonel Debriſay, an accompliſhed officer of great experience. The enemy no ſooner perceived the coaſt clear than they deſcended from the hills, and endeavoured to take poſſeſſion of the town, from which however they were driven by the fire of the citadel. They afterwards erected a battery, from whence they annoyed this fortification both with ſhot and ſhells, and even threatened a regular attac; but as often as they approached the place, they were repulſed by ſallies from the caſtle[n]. In the midſt of theſe hoſtilities, the gallant Debriſay, together with major Trollop, one lieutenant, two bombardiers, and ſeveral common ſoldiers, were blown up, and periſhed, by the exploſion of a powder-magazine at the flanked angle of the ſouth-eaſt baſtion. The confuſion neceſſarily produced by ſuch an unfortunate accident encouraged the enemy to come pouring down from the hills, in order to make their advantage of the diſaſter; but they were ſoon repulſed by the fire of the garriſon. The general, being made acquainted with the fate of colonel Debriſay, conferred the government of the fort upon major Melvil, and ſent thither the chief engineer to repair and improve the fortifications.

In the mean time, commodore Moore having received

[l] The letter was to this effect:

To their Excellencies Meſſ. Hopſon and Moore, General Officers of his Britannick Majeſty, at Baſſeterre.

'Gentlemen,

'I have received the letter, which your excellencies have done me the honour to write, of the 25th. You make me propoſals which could ariſe from nothing but the facility with which you have got poſſeſſion of the little town and citadel of Baſſeterre; for otherwiſe you ought to do me the juſtice to believe they could not be received. You have ſtrength ſufficient to ſubdue the exteriors of the iſland; but with reſpect to the interiors, the match between us is equal. As to the conſequences that may attend my refuſal, I am perſuaded they will be no other than ſuch as are preſcribed by the laws of war. Should we be diſappointed in this particular, we have a maſter powerful enough to revenge any injury we may ſuſtain. I am, with reſpect,

'Gentlemen,

'Your moſt obedient ſervant.

'NADAU d'ETREIL.'

It is pretty remarkable, that the apprehenſion of cruel uſage from the Engliſh, who are undoubtedly the moſt generous and humane enemies under the ſun, not only prevailed among the common ſoldiery throughout this whole war, but even infected officers of diſtinction, who ought to have been exempted from theſe prejudices, by a better acquaintance with life, and a more liberal turn of thinking.

[m] A re-enforcement of 2 or 300 Highlanders had joined the fleet immediately before the troops landed at Guadaloupe.

[n] The battery which they had raiſed was attacked at noon, taken, and deſtroyed by captain Blomer, of the 61ſt regiment.

certain intelligence that monſ. de Bompart had arrived at Martinique, with a ſquadron, conſiſting of eight ſail of the line and three frigates, having on board a whole battalion of Swiſs, and ſome other troops, to re-enforce the garriſons of the iſland, he called in his cruiſers, and ſailed immediately to the bay of Dominique, an iſland to windward, at the diſtance of nine leagues from Guadaloupe, whence he could always ſail to oppoſe any deſigns which the French commander might form againſt the operations of the Britiſh armaments. For what reaſon mr. Moore did not ſail immediately to the bay of Port-Royal in Martinique, where he knew the French ſquadron lay at anchor, we ſhall not pretend to determine. Had he taken that ſtep M. Bompart muſt either have given him battle, or retired into the Carenage, behind the citadel; in which laſt caſe, the Engliſh commander might have anchored between Pigeon-iſland and Fort-Negro, and thus blocked him up effectually. By retiring to Dominique, he left the ſea open to French privateers, who roved along the coaſts of theſe iſlands, and in a very little time carried into Martinique above 80 merchant-ſhips belonging to the ſubjects of Great-Britain. Theſe continual depredations committed under the noſe of the Engliſh commodore irritated the planters of the Engliſh iſlands, ſome of whom are ſaid to have circulated unfavourable reports of that gentleman's character.°

General Barrington being left with no more than one ſhip of 40 guns for the protection of the tranſports, formed a plan of proſecuting the war in Guadaloupe by detachments, and the ſucceſs fully anſwered his expectation. He determined to make a deſcent on the diviſion of the iſland called Grande-terre, and for that purpoſe alloted 600 men; who, under the command of colonel Crump, landed between the towns of St. Anne and St. François, and deſtroyed ſome batteries of the enemy, from whom he ſuſtained very little oppoſition. While he was thus employed, a detachment of 300 men attacked the town of Goſier, which, notwithſtanding a ſevere fire, they took by ſtorm, drove the garriſon into the woods, ſet fire to the place, and demoliſhed the battery and entrenchments raiſed for its defence. This ſervice being happily performed, the detachment was ordered to force their way to Fort-Louis, while the garriſon of that caſtle was directed to make two ſallies, in order to favour their irruption. They accordingly penetrated with ſome loſs ſuſtained in forcing a ſtrong paſs, and took poſſeſſion of a battery which the enemy had raiſed againſt the Engliſh camp, in the neighbourhood of Fort-Louis. The general, having hitherto ſucceeded in his deſign, formed the ſcheme of ſurpriſing at one time the three towns of Petit-bourg, Gonoyave, and St. Mary, ſituated on the Baſſe-terre ſide of the little Cul de Sac, and committed the execution of it to the colonels Crump and Clavering: but the night appointed for the ſervice proved exceedingly dark and tempeſtuous, and the negro conductors were ſo frightened, that they ran ſeveral of the flat-bottomed boats on the ſhoals that ſkirt this part of the iſland. Colonel Clavering landed with about 80 men; but found himſelf ſo entangled with mangrove trees, and the mud ſo impaſſably deep, that he was obliged to re-embark, though not before the enemy had diſcovered his deſign. This project having miſcarried, the general detached the ſame commanders, whoſe gallantry and conduct cannot be ſufficiently applauded, with a detachment of 1500 men, including 150 volunteers from Antigua, to land in a bay not far from the town of Arnonville, at the bottom of the little Cul de Sac, under the protection of his majeſty's ſhip Woolwich. The enemy made no oppoſition to their landing; but retreated, as the Engliſh advanced, to a ſtrong entrenchment thrown up behind the river Licorne, a poſt of the utmoſt importance, as it covered the whole country as far as the bay of Mahaut, where proviſions and ſupplies of all ſorts were landed from St. Euſtatia. The river was rendered inacceſſible by a moraſs, covered with mangroves, except at two narrow paſſes, which they had fortified with a redoubt, and entrenchments well palliſaded, mounted with cannon, and defended by a numerous militia: beſides, the narrow roads, through which only they could be attacked, were interſected with deep and wide ditches. Notwithſtanding theſe diſadvantages, the Engliſh commanders determined to hazard an aſſault. While four field-pieces and two howitzers maintained a conſtant fire upon the top of the entrenchments, the regiment of Duroure and the Highlanders advanced under this cover, firing by platoons with the utmoſt regularity. The enemy, intimidated by their cool and reſolute behaviour, began to abandon the firſt entrenchment on the left. Then the Highlanders drawing their ſwords, and ſuſtained by part of the regiment, threw themſelves in with their uſual impetuoſity, and followed the fugitives pell-mell into the redoubt, of which they took poſſeſſion: but they ſtill maintained their ground within the entrenchments on the right, from whence they annoyed the aſſailants both with muſketry and cannon. In half an hour, an occaſionable bridge being made, the Engliſh troops paſſed the river, in order to attac this poſt, which the enemy abandoned with precipitation: notwithſtanding all their haſte, however, about 70 were taken priſoners, and among theſe ſome of the moſt conſiderable inhabitants of the iſland. This advantage coſt the Engliſh 2 officers and 13 men killed, and above 50 wounded.

The roads being mended for the paſſage of the artillery, the troops advanced toward Petit-bourg, harraſſed in their march by flying bodies of the enemy, and arrived late at night on the banks of the river Lizarde, the only ford of which the French had fortified with ſtrong entrenchments, protected by a battery of four cannon, erected on a riſing ground in their rear. Colonel Clavering, while he amuſed them all night at this place by a conſtant fire into the lines, tranſported in two canoes, which he launched about a mile and a half farther down the river, a ſufficient number of troops, by day-break, to attac them on the other ſide in flank, while he advanced in front at the head of his little army; but they did not think proper to ſuſtain the aſſault. On the contrary, they no ſooner perceived his intention, than they forſook the poſt, and fled without order. Colonel Clavering, having paſſed the river, purſued them to Petit-bourg, which they had alſo fortified; and here he found captain Uvedale, of the Grenada bomb-ketch, throughing ſhells into the redoubt. He forthwith ſent detachments to occupy the neighbouring heights; a circumſtance which the enemy no ſooner obſerved, than they deſerted the place, and retired with great expedition. On the 15th day of April captain Steel deſtroyed a battery at Gonoyave, a ſtrong poſt, which, though it might have been defended againſt an army, the French abandoned at his approach, after having made a haſty diſcharge of their artillery. At the ſame time colonel Crump was detached with 700 men to the bay of Mahut, where he burned the town and batteries, which he found abandoned, together with a vaſt quantity of proviſions, which had been brought from the iſland of St. Euſtatia. Colonel Clavering, having left a ſmall garriſon at Petit-bourg, began his march on the 20th day of the month towards St. Mary's, where he underſtood the enemy had collected their whole force, thrown up entrenchments, and raiſed barricadoes: but they had left their rear ungarded. The Engliſh commander immediately detached colonel Barlow, with a body of troops to attac them from that quarter, while he himſelf advanced againſt the front of their entrenchment. They ſtood but one cannon-ſhot, and then fled to their lines and batteries at St. Mary's, the flanks of which were covered with woods and precipices. When they perceived the Engliſh troops endeavouring to ſurmount theſe difficulties, and turn their lines, they quitted them, in order to oppoſe the deſign; and were immediately attacked with ſuch vivacity, in the face of a ſevere fire of muſketry and cannon, that they abandoned their ground, and fled in the utmoſt confuſion, leaving the field and all their artillery to the victors, who took up their quarters for the night at St. Mary's. Next day, they entered the charming country of Capeſterre, where 870 negroes belonging to one planter ſurrendered at diſcretion. Here colonel Clavering was met by meſſieurs de Clainvilliers and Duqueruy, deputed by the principal inhabitants of the iſland to know what capitulation would be granted. Theſe he conducted to Petit-bourg, where they were preſented to general Barrington, who conſidering the abſence of the fleet, the ſmall number of his forces, daily diminiſhing, the difficulty of the country, and the poſſibility of the enemy's being re-enforced from Martinique, wiſely took the advantage of their preſent panic, and ſettled terms of capitulation without delay. The ſanity of this reſolution ſoon appeared. The inhabitants had juſt ſigned the agreement, when a meſſenger arrived in their camp, with information, that M. de Beauharnois, the general of the French iſlands, had landed at St. Anne's to the windward, with a re-enforcement from Martinique, conſiſting of 600 regulars from Europe, about 1500 volunteers, beſides a great number of the militia drafted from the companies of Martinique, with a great ſupply of arms and ammunition, mortars and artillery, under convoy of the ſquadron commanded by M. de Bompart, who no ſooner learned that the capitulation was ſigned, than he re-embarked the troops and ſtores with all poſſible expedition, and returned to Martinique. Thus we ſee the conqueſt of this important iſland, which is ſaid to produce a greater quantity of ſugar than is made in any of the Engliſh plantations, was as much owing to accident as to the valour of the troops and the conduct of the general; for, had the re-enforcement arrived an hour ſooner than it actually landed, in all probability the Engliſh would have found it impracticable to finiſh the reduction of Guadaloupe. Be that as it may, the natives certainly deſerved great commendation, not only for perſevering ſo gallantly in defence of their country, but alſo for their fortitude in hearing every ſpecies of diſtreſs. They now quitted the Dos d'Ane, and all their other poſts, and returned to their reſpective habitations. The town of Baſſeterre being reduced to a heap of aſhes, the inhabitants began to clear away the rubbiſh, and erect occaſional ſheds, where they reſumed their ſeveral occupations with that good-humour ſo peculiar to the French nation; and general Barrington humanely indulged them with all the aſſiſtance in his power.

° The reaſons aſſigned by the commodore for his conduct in this particular are theſe:—The bay of Dominique was the only place in which he could rendezvous and unite his ſquadron. Here he refreſhed his men, who were grown ſicly in conſequence of ſubſiſting on ſalt proviſion. Here he ſupplied his ſhips with plenty of freſh water. Here he had intercourſe once or twice every day with general Barrington, by means of ſmall veſſels which paſſed and repaſſed from one iſland to the other. By remaining in this ſituation, he likewiſe maintained a communication with the Engliſh Leeward-Iſlands, which being in a defenceleſs condition, their inhabitants were conſtantly ſolliciting the commodore's protection; and here he ſupported the army, the commander of which was unwilling that he ſhould remove to a greater diſtance. Had he ſailed to Port-Royal, he would have found the enemy's ſquadron ſo diſpoſed, that he could not have attacked them, unleſs M. de Bompart had been inclined to hazard an action. Had he anchored in the bay, all his cruiſers muſt have been employed in conveying proviſions and ſtores to the ſquadron. There he could not have procured either freſh proviſions or water; nor could he have had any communication with, nor intelligence from, the army in the Leeward-Iſlands, in leſs than eight or ten days.

The ſmall iſlands of Deſeada, Los-Santos, and Petit-terre were compriſed in the capitulation of Guadaloupe. The inhabitants of Marigalante, which lies about three leagues to the ſouth-eaſt of Grande-terre, extending 20 miles in length, 15 in breadth, flat and fertile, but poorly watered and ill fortified, having refuſed to ſubmit when ſummoned by the ſquadron to ſurrender, general Barrington reſolved to reduce them by force. He embarked a body of troops on board of tranſports, which ſailed thither under convoy of three ſhips of war and two bomb-veſſels from Prince Rupert's Bay, and at their appearance the iſlanders ſubmitting, received an Engliſh garriſon. Before this period, commodore Moore having received intelligence that M. de Bompart had ſailed from Martinique, with deſign to land a re-enforcement on Guadaloupe, and that his ſquadron was ſeen ſeven leagues to windward of Marigalante, he ſailed from Prince Rupert's Bay, and turned to windward. After having been beaten about for five days to very little purpoſe, he received notice from one of his cruiſers, that the French admiral had returned to Martinique; upon which information he retired quietly to his former ſtation in the bay of Dominique, the people of which were ſo inſolent as to affirm, in diriſion, that the Engliſh ſquadron ſailed on one ſide of the iſland, and the French upon the other, that they might be ſure of not meeting; but this, without doubt, was an impudent calumny. [p]

General Barrington, having happily finiſhed the conqueſt of Guadaloupe, gave notice to the commodore, that he intended to ſend bac part of the troops, with the tranſports, to England, about the beginning of July. In conſequence of this intimation, mr. Moore ſailed with his ſquadron to Baſſeterre road, where he was next day joined by two ſhips of the line from England, which rendered him greatly ſuperior in ſtrength to the commander of the French ſquadron, who had retired to the iſland of Grenada, lying about eight leagues from Guadaloupe. Here he was diſcovered by the ſhip Rippon, whoſe captain returned immediately to Baſſeterre, to make the commodore acquainted with this circumſtance: but, before he could weigh anchor, a frigate arrived, with information that M. de Bompart had quitted Grenada, and was ſuppoſed to have directed his courſe to Hiſpaniola. The commodore immediately deſpatched the Ludlow-caſtle with this intelligence to admiral Coates, who commanded the ſquadron at Jamaica. General Barrington having made a tour of the iſland, in order to viſit and repair ſuch fortifications as he thought neceſſary to be maintained, and the affairs relating to the inhabitants being entirely ſettled, he ſent the Highlanders, with a body of drafts, to North-America, under convoy: he garriſoned the principal ſtrengths of the iſland, and left the chief command to colonel Crump, who had for ſome time acted as brigadier-general, colonel Clavering having been ſent home to England with the account of the capitulation. Colonel Melville, who had ſignalized himſelf in a remarkable manner ever ſince their firſt landing, continued governor of the citadel at Baſſeterre; and the command at Grande-terre was conferred on colonel Delgarno. Three complete regiments were allotted as a ſufficient guard for the whole iſland, and the other three were embarked for England. General Barrington himſelf went on board the Roebuck in the latter end of June, and took his departure for England. About a month after, the tranſports, under convoy of captain Hughes, with a ſmall ſquadron, ſet ſail for Great-Britain, while commodore Moore, with his large fleet, directed his courſe to Antigua.

While this armament had been employed in the conqueſt of Guadaloupe, North-America exhibited ſtill more ſanguinary ſcenes of war and devaſtation, which, in order properly to introduce, it will be neceſſary to explain the ſteps that were taken on this continent, previous to this campaign. In October of the preceding year, a grand aſſembly was held at Eaſton, about 90 miles from Philadelphia; and there a peace was eſtabliſhed, by a formal treaty between Great-Britain and the ſeveral nations of Indians inhabiting the country between the Apalachian mountains and the lakes. The Twightwees, however, ſettled between the river Ohio and the lakes, did not aſſiſt at this treaty, though ſome ſteps had been taken towards an alliance with that people. The conferences were managed by the governors of Pennſylvania and New-Jerſey, accompanied by ſir William Johnſon's deputy for Indian affairs, four members of the council of Pennſylvania, ſix members of the aſſembly, two agents for the province of New-Jerſey, a great number of planters, and citizens of Philadelphia, chiefly quakers. They were met by the deputies and chiefs of the Mohawks, Oneidoes, Onondagoes, Cayugas, Senecas, Tuſcaroras, Nanticoques, and Conoys, the Tutèloes, Chugnues, Delawares, and Unamies, the Miniſinks, Mohicons, and Wappingers; the whole number including their women and children, amounting to 500. Some of the Six Nations, thinking themſelves aggrieved by the Britiſh coloniſts, who had impriſoned certain individuals of their nation, and had killed a few, and treated others with contempt, did not fail to expreſs their reſentment, which had been artfully fomented by the French emiſſaries, even into an open rupture. The Delawares and Miniſinks, in particular, complained that the Engliſh had encroached upon their lands, and on that account were provoked to hoſtilities: but their chief, Teedyuſcung, had made overtures of peace; and, in the character of embaſſador from all the ten nations, had been very inſtrumental in forming this aſſembly. The chiefs of the Six Nations, though very well diſpoſed to peace, took umbrage at the importance aſſumed by one of the Delawares, over whom, as their deſcendants, they exerciſe a kind of parental authority; and on this occaſion they made no ſcruple to diſcloſe their diſſatisfaction. The buſineſs, therefore, of the Engliſh governors at this congreſs was to aſcertain the limits of the lands in diſpute, reconcile the Six Nations with their nephews, the Delawares, remove every cauſe of miſunderſtanding between the Engliſh and the Indians, detach theſe ſavages entirely from the French intereſt, eſtabliſh a firm peace, and induce them to exert their influence in perſuading the Twightwees, to accede to this treaty. Thoſe Indians, though poſſeſſed of few ideas, circumſcribed in their mental faculties, ſtupid, brutal, and ferocious, conduct themſelves, nevertheleſs, in matters of importance to the community, by the general maxims of reaſon and juſtice; and their treaties are always founded upon good ſenſe, conveyed in a very ridiculous manner. Their language is guttural, harſh, and polyſyllabical; and their ſpeech conſiſts of hyperbolical metaphors and ſimilies, which inveſt it with an air of dignity, and heighten the expreſſion. They manage their conferences by means of wampum, a kind of bead, formed of a hard ſhell, either in ſingle ſtrings, or ſewed in broad belts of different dimenſions, according to the importance of the ſubject. Every propoſition is offered, every anſwer made,

[p] The commodore declares that he carried a preſs-ſail night and day, in order to come up with the French ſquadron, and took every ſtep that could be deviſed for that purpoſe. He ſays, if he had purſued any other courſe, the French commander might have run into the road of St. Kit's, and deſtroyed or taken a great number of merchant-ſhips which were then loading with ſugars for England.

He ſays he tried every ſtratagem he could contrive for bringing M. de Bompart to action. He even ſent away part of his ſquadron out of ſight of the inhabitants of Dominique, that they might repreſent to their friends at Martinique his force much inferior to what it really was; but this expedient had no effect upon M. de Bompart, who made the beſt of his way to Cape-François, on the iſland of Hiſpaniola.

every promiſe corroborated, every declaration atteſted, and every treaty confirmed, by producing and interchanging theſe belts of Wampum. The conferences were continued from the 8th to the 26th day of October, when every article was ſettled to the mutual ſatisfaction of all parties. The Indian deputies were gratified with a valuable preſent, conſiſting of looking-glaſſes, knives, tobacco-boxes, ſleeve-buttons, thimbles, ſheers, gun-locks, ivory-combs, ſhirts, ſhoes, ſtockings, hats, caps, handkerchiefs, thread, clothes, blankets, gartering, ſerges, watch-coats, and a few ſuits of laced clothes for their chieftains. To crown their happineſs, the ſtores of rum were opened; they drank themſelves into a ſtate of brutal intoxication, and next day returned in peace to their reſpective places of habitation.

This treaty with the Indians, who had been debauched from the intereſt of Great-Britain, auſpiciouſly paved the way for thoſe operations which had been projected againſt the French ſettlements in Canada. Inſtead of employing the whole ſtrength of the Britiſh arms in North-America againſt one object, the miniſtry propoſed to divide the forces, and make impreſſions on three different parts at once, that the enemy might be divided, diſtracted and weakened, and the conqueſt of Canada completed in one campaign. That the ſucceſs might be the more certain, the different expeditions were planned in ſuch a manner as to co-operate with each other, and even join occaſionally; ſo practicable was it thought for them to maintain ſuch a correſpondence as would admit of a junction of this nature. The project of this campaign imported, that general Wolfe, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo eminently in the ſiege of Louiſbourg, ſhould proceed up the river St. Laurence, as ſoon as the navigation ſhould be clear of ice, with a body of 8000 men, and a conſiderable ſquadron of ſhips from England, to undertake the ſiege of Quebeck, the capital of Canada: that general Amhurſt, who commanded in chief, ſhould, with another army of regular troops and provincials, amounting to 12,000 men, reduce Ticonderoga and Crown-Point, croſs the lake Champlain, and, proceeding along the river Richelieu to the banks of the river St. Laurence, join general Wolfe in the ſiege of Quebeck: that brigadier-general Prideaux, with a third body, re-enforced with a conſiderable number of friendly Indians, aſſembled by the influence and under the command of ſir William Johnſon, ſhould inveſt the French fort erected by the fall or cataract of Niagara, which was certainly the moſt important poſts of French America, as it in a manner commanded all the interior parts of that vaſt continent. It overawed the whole country of the Six Nations, who were cajoled into a tame acquieſcence in its being built on their territory: it ſecured all the inland trade, the navigation of the great lakes, the communication between Canada and Louſiana, and opened a paſſage for inroads into the colonies of Great-Britain. It was propoſed that the Britiſh forces having reduced Niagara, ſhould be embarked on the lake Ontario, fall down the river St. Laurence, beſiege and take Montreal, and then join to co-operate with Amherſt's army. Beſide theſe larger armaments, colonel Stanwix commanded a ſmaller detachment for reducing ſmaller forts, and ſcouring the banks of the lake Ontario. How far this project was founded on reaſon and military knowledge may be judged by the following particulars, of which the projectors were not ignorant. The navigation of the river St. Laurence is dangerous and uncertain. The city of Quebeck was remarkably ſtrong from ſituation and fortification, from the bravery of the inhabitants, and the number of the garriſon. Monſieur de Montcalm, an officer of great courage and activity, kept the field between Montreal and Quebeck, with a body of 8 or 10,000 men, conſiſting of regular troops and diſciplined militia, re-enforced by a conſiderable number of armed Indians; and another body of reſerve hovered in the neighbourhood of Montreal, which was the reſidence of monſieur de Vandreuil, governor general of Canada. The garriſon of Niagara conſiſted of above 600 men; the march to it was tedious and embarraſſed; and monſieur de Levi ſcoured the country with a flying detachment, well acquainted with all the woods and paſſes. With reſpect to general Amherſt's ſhare of the plan, the forts of Ticonderoga and Crown-Point ſtood in his way. The enemy was maſters of the lake Champlain, and poſſeſſed a ſtrong fort of Chambly, by the fall of the river Richelieu, which defended the paſs to the river St. Laurence. Even had theſe obſtacles been removed, it was hardly poſſible that he and mr. Wolfe ſhould arrive at Quebeck in the ſame inſtant of time. The firſt that reached it, far from being in a condition to undertake the ſiege of Quebeck, would have run the riſk of being engaged and defeated by the covering army; in which caſe, the other body muſt have been expoſed to the moſt imminent hazard of deſtruction, in the midſt of an enemy's country, far diſtant from any place of ſafety to which it could retreat. Had theſe diſaſters happened, and, according to the experience of war, they were the natural conſequences of the ſcheme, the troops at Niagara would in all probability have fallen an eaſy ſacrifice, unleſs they had been ſo fortunate as to receive intelligence time enough to accompliſh their retreat before they could be intercepted. The deſign would, we apprehend, have been more juſtifiable, or at leaſt not ſo liable to objection, had mr. Amherſt left two or three regiments to protect the frontiers of New-York, and joining mr. Wolfe with the reſt, ſailed up the river St. Laurence to beſiege Quebeck. Even in that caſe, the whole number of his troops would not have been ſufficient, according to the practice of war, to inveſt the place, and cope with the covering enemy. Nevertheleſs, had the enterprize ſucceeded, Montcalm muſt either have hazarded an engagement againſt great odds, or retired farther into the country: then the rout would have been open by land and water to Montreal, which could have made little reſiſtance. The two principal towns being taken, and the navigation of St. Laurence blocked up, all the dependant forts muſt have ſurrendered at diſcretion, except Niagara, which there was a bare poſſibility of ſupplying, at an incredible trouble and expence, from the diſtant Miſſiſſippi; but, even then, it might have been beſieged in form, and eaſily reduced. Whatever defects there might have been in the plan, the execution, though it miſcarried in ſome eſſential points, was attended with ſurpriſing ſucceſs. The ſame good fortune that proſpered the Britiſh arms ſo remarkably in the conqueſt of Guadaloupe ſeemed to interpoſe ſtill more aſtoniſhingly in their favour at Quebeck, the ſiege of which we ſhall record in its proper place. At preſent we muſt attend the opperations of general Amherſt, whoſe ſeparate army was firſt in motion, though ſuch impediments were thrown in his way as greatly retarded the progreſs of his operations; impediments ſaid to have ariſen from the pride, inſolence, and obſtinacy of certain individuals, who poſſeſſed great influence in that part of the world, and employed it all to thwart the ſervice of their country.

The ſummer was already far advanced before general Amherſt could paſs the lake George with his forces, although they met with no oppoſition, and reach the neighbourhood of Ticonderoga, where in the preceding year, the Britiſh troops had ſuſtained ſuch a terrible diſaſter. At firſt the enemy ſeemed determined to defend this fortreſs: but perceiving the Engliſh commander reſolute, cautious, and well prepared for undertaking the ſiege; having, moreover, orders to retreat from place to place, towards the centre of operations at Quebeck, rather than run the leaſt riſk of being made priſoners of war; they in the night of July the 27th abandoned the poſt, after having in ſome meaſure diſmantled the fortifications, and retired to Crown-Point, a fort ſituated in the verge of lake Champlain. General Amherſt having taken poſſeſſion of this important poſt, which effectually covered the frontiers of New-York, and ſecured to himſelf a ſafe retreat in caſe of neceſſity, ordered the works to be repaired, and allotted a ſtrong garriſon for its defence. This acquiſition, however, was not made without the loſs of a brave accompliſhed young officer, colonel Roger Townſhend, who, in reconnoitring the fort, was killed with a cannon-ſhot, and fell near the ſame ſpot which in the former year had been enriched with the blood of the gallant lord Howe, whom he ſtrongly reſembled in the circumſtances of birth, age, qualifications, and character.

While the general ſuperintended the repairs of Ticonderoga, and the men were employed in preparing batteaux and other veſſels, his ſcouting parties hovered in the neighbourhood of Crown-Point, in order to watch the motions of the enemy. From one of theſe detachments he received intelligence on the 1ſt day of Auguſt, that the enemy had retired from Crown-Point. He immediately detached a body of rangers before him, to take poſſeſſion of the place: then he embarked with the reſt of the army, and on the 4th day of the month landed on the fort, where the troops were immediately encamped. His next care was to lay the foundation of a new fort, to be maintained for the further ſecurity of the Britiſh dominions in that part of the country, and particularly for preventing the inroads of ſcalping parties, by whom the plantations had been dreadfully infeſted. Here information was received that the enemy had retired to the Iſle auz Noix, at the other end of the lake Champlain, five leagues on the hither ſide of St. John's; that their force encamped in that place, under the command of M. de Burlemaque, conſiſted of three battalions and five piquets of regular troops with Canadians and marines, amounting in the whole to 3500 effective men, provided with a numerous artillery; and that the lake was occupied by four large veſſels, mounted with cannon, and manned with piquets of different regiments, under the command and direction of M. le Bras, a captain in the French navy, aſſiſted by M. de Rigal, and other ſea officers. In conſequence of this intimation, general Amherſt, who had for ſome time employed captain Loring to ſuperintend the building of veſſels at Ticonderoga, being reſolved to have the ſuperiority on the lake, directed the captain to build with all poſſible expedition a ſloop of 16 guns, and a radeau 84 feet in length, capable of carrying ſix large cannon. Theſe, together with a brigantine, being finiſhed, victualled, and manned by the 11th day of October, the general embarked with the whole of the troops in batteaux, in order to attac the enemy; but next day the weather growing tempeſtuous, was obliged to take ſhelter in a bay on the weſtern ſhore, where the men were landed for refreſhment. In the mean time, captain Loring, with his ſmall ſquadron, ſailing down the lake, gave chaſe to a French ſchooner, and drove three of their ſhips into a bay, where two of them were very ſoon after ſunk, and the third run a-ground by their own crew, who eſcaped: one, however, was repaired and brought away by captain Loring, ſo that now the French had but one ſchooner remaining. General Amherſt, after having been ſome days wind-bound, re-embarked his forces, and proceeded down the lake; but the ſtorm, which had abated, beginning to blow with redoubled fury, ſo as to ſwell the waves mountain high, the ſeaſon for action being elapſed, and winter ſetting in with the moſt rigorous ſeverity, he ſaw the impoſſibility of accompliſhing his deſign, and was obliged to deſiſt. Returning to the ſame bay where he had been ſheltered, he landed the troops, and began his march for Crown-Point, where he arrived on the 21ſt day of October. Having ſecured a ſuperiority on the lake, he now employed all his attention in rearing the new fortreſs at Crown-Point, together with three ſmall out-forts for its better defence; in opening roads of communication with Ticonderoga, and the governments of Maſſachuſett's and New Hampſhire; and in making diſpoſitions for the winter-quarters of his troops, ſo as to protect the country from the inroads of the enemy.

During this whole ſummer he received not the leaſt intelligence of mr. Wolfe's operations, except a few hints in ſome letters relating to the exchange of priſoners, that came from the French general, Montcalm, who gave him to underſtand, that mr. Wolfe had landed in the neighbourhood of Quebeck, and ſeemed determined to undertake the ſiege of that city: that he had honoured him (the French general) with ſeveral notes, ſometimes couched in a ſoothing ſtrain, ſometimes filled with threats; that the French army intended to give him battle, and a few days would determine the fate of Quebeck. Though mr. Amherſt was ignorant of the proceedings of the Quebeck ſquadron, his communication continued open with the forces which undertook the ſiege of Niagara; and he received an account of their ſucceſs before he had quitted the lines of Ticonderoga. General Prideaux, with his body of troops, re-enforced by the Indian auxiliaries under ſir William Johnſon, advanced to the cataract of Niagara, without being expoſed to the leaſt inconvenience on his march; and inveſting the French fortreſs about the middle of July, carried on his approaches with great vigour till the 20th day of that month, when viſiting the trenches, he was unfortunately ſlain by the burſting of a cohorn. Mr Amherſt was no ſooner informed of this diſaſter, than he detached brigadier-general Gage from Ticonderoga, to aſſume the command of that army. In the mean time, it devolved on ſir William Johnſon, who happily proſecuted the plan of his predeceſſor with all the ſucceſs that could have been deſired. The enemy alarmed with the apprehenſion of loſing a place of ſuch importance, reſolved to exert their endeavours for its relief. They aſſembled a body of regular troops, amounting to 1200 men, drawn from Detroit, Venango, and Preſque Iſle; and theſe, with a number of Indian auxiliaries, were detached under the command of monſieur d'Aubry, on an attempt to re-enforce the garriſon of Niagara. Sir William Johnſon having received intelligence of their deſign, made a diſpoſition to intercept them in their march. In the evening he ordered the light infantry and piquets to poſt themſelves to the left, on the road leading from Niagara falls to the fortreſs: theſe were re-enforced in the morning with the grenadiers, and part of the 46th regiment, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Maſſey; and another regiment under lieutanant-colonel Farquhar, was poſted at the tail of the works, in order to ſupport the guard of the trenches. About eight in the morning, the enemy being in ſight, the Indians in the Engliſh army advanced to ſpeak with their countrymen who ſerved under the French banners; but this conference was declined by the enemy. Then the French Indians having uttered the horrible ſcream called the war-whoop, which by this time had loſt its effect among the Britiſh forces, the enemy began the action with impetuoſity: but they met with ſuch a hot reception in front, while the Indian auxiliaries fell upon their flanks, that in a little more than half an hour their whole army was routed, their general, with all his officers, taken, and the purſuit continued through the woods for ſeveral miles with conſiderable ſlaughter. This battle which happened on the 24th day of July, having been fought in ſight of the French garriſon at Niagara, ſir William Johnſon ſent major Harvey with a trumpet to the commanding officer, to preſent him with a liſt of 17 officers taken in the engagement, and to exhort him to ſurrender before more blood was ſhed, while he had it in his power to reſtrain the Indians. The commandant having certified himſelf of the truth, by ſending an officer to viſit the priſoners, agreed to treat, and in a few hours the capitulation was ratified. The garriſon, conſiſting of 607 effective men, marched out with the honours of war, in order to be embarked in veſſels on the lake, and conveyed in the moſt expeditious manner to New-York. They laid down their arms when they embarked; but were permitted to keep their baggage, and by a proper eſcorte, protected from the ſavage inſolence and rapacity of the Indidians. All the women were conducted, at their own requeſt, to Montreal; and the ſic and wounded, who could not bear the fatigue of travelling, were treated with humanity. This was the ſecond complete victory obtained on the continent of North-America, in the courſe of the ſame war, by ſir William Johnſon, who, without the help of a military education, ſucceeded ſo ſignally in the field by dint of innate courage and natural ſagacity. What remarkably characteriſes theſe battles, is the circumſtance of his having taken in both the commander of the enemy. Indeed, the war in general may be diſtinguiſhed by the ſingular ſucceſs of this gentleman and the celebrated lord Clive, two ſelf-taught generals; who by a ſeries of ſhining actions, have demonſtrated, that uninſtructed genius can, by its own internal light and efficacy, rival, if not eclipſe, the acquired art of diſcipline and experience. Sir William Johnſon was not more ſerviceable to his country by his valour and conduct in the field, than by the influence and authority which his juſtice, benevolence, and integrity had acquired among the Indian tribes of the Six Nations, whom he not only aſſembled at Niagara to the number of 1100, but alſo reſtrained within the bounds of good order and moderation.

The reduction of Niagara, and the poſſeſſion of Crown-Point, were exploits much more eaſily achieved than the conqueſt of Quebeck, the great object to which all theſe operations were ſubordinate. Of that we now come to give the detail, fraught with ſingular adventures and ſurpriſing events; in the courſe of which a noble ſpirit of enterprize was diſplayed, and the ſcenes of war were exhibited in all the variety of deſolation. It was about the middle of February that a conſiderable ſquadron ſailed from England for Cape-Breton, under the command of admirals Saunders and Holmes, two gentlemen of worth and probity, who had on ſeveral occaſions ſignalized their courage and conduct in the ſervice of their country. By the 21ſt day of April they were in ſight of Louiſbourg; but the harbour was blocked up with ice in ſuch a manner, that they were obliged to bear away for Halifax, in Nova-Scotia. From hence rear-admiral Durell was detached, with a ſmall ſquadron, to ſail up the river St. Laurence as far as the iſle de Coudres, in order to intercept any ſupplies from France intended for Quebeck: he accordingly took two ſtore-ſhips; but he was anticipated by 17 ſail, laden with proviſion, ſtores, and ſome recruits, under convoy of three frigates, which had already reached the capital of Canada. Mean while admiral Saunders arrived at Louiſbourg; and the troops being embarked, to the number of 8000, proceeded up the river without further delay. The operations by land were entruſted to the conduct of major-general James Wolfe, whoſe talents had ſhown with ſuch ſuperior luſtre at the ſiege of Louiſbourg; and his ſubordinates in command were the brigadiers Monckton, Townſhend, and Murray; all four in the flower of their age, who had ſtudied the military art, with equal eagerneſs and proficiency, and, though young men in years, were old in experience. The firſt was a ſoldier by deſcent, the ſon of major-general Wolfe, a veteran officer of aknowledged capacity: the other three reſembled each other, not only in years, qualifications, and ſtation, but alſo in family rank, all three being the ſons of noblemen. The ſituation of brigadier Townſhend was ſingular: he had ſerved abroad in the laſt war with reputation, and reſigned his commiſſion during the peace, in diſdain at ſome hard uſage he had ſuſtained from his ſuperiors. That his military talents, however, might not be loſt to his country, he exerciſed them with equal ſpirit and perſeverance in projecting and promoting a plan of a national militia. When the command and direction of the army devolved to a new leader, ſo predominant in his breaſt was the ſpirit of patriotiſm and the love of glory, that though heir apparent to a Britiſh peerage, poſſeſſed of a very affluent fortune, remarkably dear to his acquaintance, and ſollicited to a life of quiet by every allurement of domeſtic felicity, he waved theſe conſiderations: he burſt from all entanglements; proffered his ſervices to his ſovereign; expoſed himſelf to the perils of a diſagreeable voyage, the rigours of a ſevere climate, and the hazard of a campaign peculiarly fraught with toil, danger, and difficulty.

The armament intended for Quebeck ſailed up the river St. Laurence, without having met with any interruption, or having perceived any of thoſe difficulties and perils with which it had been reported that the navigation of it was attended. Their good fortune in this particular, indeed, was owing to ſome excellent charts of the river, which had been found in veſſels taken from the enemy. About the latter end of June the land-forces were diſembarked in two diviſions upon the iſle of Orleans, ſituated a little below Quebeck, a large fertile iſland, well cultivated, producing plenty of grain, abounding with people, villages, and plantations. General Wolfe no ſooner landed on the iſland of Orleans, than he diſtributed a manifeſto among the French coloniſts, giving them to underſtand, That the king his maſter, juſtly exaſperated againſt the French monarch, had equipped a conſiderable armament, in order to humble his pride, and was determined to reduce the moſt conſiderable French ſettlements in America. He declared, it was not againſt the induſtrious peaſants, their wives, and children, nor againſt the miniſters of religion, that he intended to make war: on the contrary, he lamented the misfortunes to which they muſt be expoſed by the quarrel: he offered them his protection, and promiſed to maintain them in their temporal poſſeſſions, as well as in the free exerciſe of their religion, provided they would remain quiet, and take no part in the difference between the two crowns. He obſerved, that the Engliſh were maſters of the river St. Laurence, ſo as to intercept all ſuccours from Europe, and had, beſides, a powerful army on the continent, under the command of general Amherſt. He affirmed, that the reſolution they ought to take was neither difficult nor doubtful, as the utmoſt exertion of their valour would be uſeleſs, and ſerve only to deprive them of the advantages which they might reap from their neutrality. He reminded them, that the cruelties exerciſed by the French upon the ſubjects of Great-Britain in America would excuſe the moſt ſevere repriſals; but Britons were too generous to follow ſuch barbarous examples. He again offered to the Canadians the ſweets of peace, amidſt the horrors of war; and left it to themſelves to determine their own fate by their own conduct. He expreſſed his hope, that the world would do him juſtice, ſhould they oblige him, by rejecting theſe favourable terms, to adopt violent meaſures. He expatiated upon the ſtrength and power, as well as upon the generoſity of Great-Britain, in thus ſtretching out the hand of humanity; a hand ready to aſſiſt them on all occaſions, even when France was, by her weakneſs, compelled to abandon them in the moſt critical conjuncture. This declaration produced no immediate effect; nor, indeed, did the Canadians depend upon the ſincerity and promiſed faith a nation, whom their prieſts had induſtriouſly repreſented as the moſt ſavage and cruel enemy on earth. Poſſeſſed of theſe notions, which prevailed even among the better ſort, they choſe to abandon their habitations, and expoſe themſelves and families to certain ruin, in provoking the Engliſh by the moſt cruel hoſtilities, rather than be quiet, and confide in the general's promiſe of protection. Inſtead of purſuing this prudent plan of conduct, they joined the ſcalping parties[q] of Indians who ſkulked among the woods, and falling upon the Engliſh ſtragglers by ſurprize, butchered them with the moſt inhuman barbarity. Mr Wolfe, whoſe nature revolted againſt this wanton and perfidious cruelty, ſent a letter to the French general, repreſenting, that ſuch enormities were contrary to the rules of war obſerved among civilized nations, diſhonourable to the ſervice of France, and diſgraceful to human nature: he, therefore, deſired the French coloniſts and Indians might be reſtrained within due bounds, otherwiſe he would burn their villages, deſolate their plantations, and retaliate upon the perſons of his priſoners whatever cruelties ſhould, in the ſequel, be committed on the ſoldiers or ſubjects of his maſter. In all probability the French general's authority was not ſufficient to bridle the ferocity of the ſavages, who continued to ſcalp and murther with the moſt brutal appetite for blood and revenge; ſo that mr. Wolfe, in order to intimidate the enemy into a ceſſation of theſe outrages, found it neceſſary to connive at ſome irregularities in the way of retaliation.

M. de Montcalm, who commanded the French troops, though ſuperior in number to the invaders, very wiſely reſolved to depend upon the natural ſtrength of the country, which appeared almoſt inſurmountable, and had carefully taken all his precautions of defence. The city of Quebeck was tolerably fortified, ſecured with a numerous garriſon, and plentifully ſupplied with proviſion and ammunition. Montcalm had re-enforced the troops of the colony with 5 regular battalions, formed of the beſt of the inhabitants, completely diſciplined all the Canadians of the neighbourhood capable of bearing arms, and ſeveral tribes of ſavages. With this army he had taken the field in a very advantageous ſituation, encamped along the ſhore of Beaufort, from the river St. Charles to the falls of Montmorenci, every acceſſible part being deeply entrenched. To undertake the ſiege of Quebeck againſt ſuch odds and advantages was not only a deviation from the eſtabliſhed maxims of war, but a raſh enterprize, ſeemingly urged in diametrical oppoſition to the dictates of common ſenſe. Mr Wolfe was well acquainted with all the difficulties of the undertaking; but he knew at the ſame time he ſhould always have it in his power to retreat in caſe of emergency, while the Britiſh ſquadron maintained its ſtation in the river; he was not without hope of being joined by general Amherſt; and he was ſtimulated by an appetite for glory, which the proſpect of accumulated dangers could not allay. Underſtanding that there was a body of the enemy poſted, with cannon, at the Point of Levi, on the ſouth ſhore, oppoſite to the city of Quebeck, he detached againſt them brigadier Monckton, at the head of four battalions, who paſſed the river at night, and next morning, having ſkirmiſhed with ſome of the enemy's irregulars, obliged them to retire from that poſt, which the Engliſh immediately occupied. At the ſame time colonel Carlton, with another detachment, took poſſeſſion of the weſtern point of the iſland of Orleans; and both theſe poſts were fortified, in order to anticipate the enemy, who, had they kept poſſeſſion of either, might have rendered it impoſſible for any ſhip to lie at ancnor within two miles of Quebeck. Beſides, the Point of Levi was within cannon-ſhot of the city, againſt which a battery of mortars and artillery was immediately erected. Montcalm, foreſeeing the effect of this manœuvre, detached a body of 1600 men acroſs the river, to attac and deſtroy the works before they were completed: but the detachment fell into diſorder, fired upon each other, and retired in confuſion. The battery being finiſhed without further interruption, the cannon and mortars began to play with ſuch ſucceſs, that in a little time the upper town was conſiderably damaged, and the lower town reduced to a heap of rubbiſh.

In the mean time, the fleet was expoſed to the moſt imminent danger. Immediately after the troops had been landed on the iſland of Orleans the wind increaſed to a furious ſtorm, which blew with ſuch violence, that many tranſports ran foul of one another, and were diſabled. A number of boats and ſmall craft foundered, and divers large ſhips loſt their anchors. The enemy reſolving to take advantage of the confuſion which they imagined this diſaſter muſt have produced, prepared ſeven fire-ſhips, and at midnight ſent them down from Quebeck among the tranſports, which lay ſo thic as to cover the whole ſurface of the river. The ſcheme, though well contrived, and ſeaſonably executed, was entirely defeated by the deliberation of the Britiſh admiral, and the dexterity of his mariners, who reſolutely boarded the fire-ſhips, and towed them faſt a-ground, where they lay burning to the water's edge, without having done the leaſt prejudice to the Engliſh ſquadron. On the very ſame day of the ſucceeding month, they ſent down a raft of fire-ſhips, or radeaux, which was likewiſe conſumed, without producing any effect.

[q] The operation of ſcalping, which, to the ſhame of both nations, was encouraged both by French and Engliſh, the ſavages performed in this manner:—The hapleſs victim being diſabled, or diſarmed, the Indian, with a ſharp knife, provided and worn for the purpoſe, makes a circular inciſion to the bone round the upper part of the head, and tears off the ſcalp with his fingers. Previous to this execution, he generally diſpatches the priſoner by repeated blows on the head with the hammer-ſide of the inſtrument called a tomahawk: but ſometimes they ſave themſelves the trouble, and ſometimes the blows prove ineffectual, ſo that the miſerable patient is found alive, groaning in the utmoſt agony of torture. The Indian ſtrings the ſcalps he has procured, to be produced as a teſtimony of his proweſs, and receives a premium for each from the nation under whoſe banners he has inliſted.

The works for the ſecurity of the hoſpital, and the ſtores on the iſland of Orleans, being finiſhed, the Britiſh forces croſſed the north channel in boats, and landing under cover of two ſloops, encamped on the ſide of the river Montmorenci, which divided them from the left of the enemy. Next morning a company of rangers poſted in a wood to cover ſome workmen were attacked by the French Indians, and totally defeated; however, the neareſt troops advancing, repulſed the Indians in their turn with conſiderable loſs. The reaſons that induced general Wolfe to chooſe this ſituation by the falls of Montmorenci, in which he was divided from Quebeck by this, and another river called St. Charles, he explained in a letter to the ſecretary of ſtate. He obſerved, that the ground which he had choſen was high, and in ſome meaſure commanded the oppoſite ſide on which the enemy was poſted: that there was a ford below the falls paſſable in every tide for ſome hours at the latter part of the ebb and beginning of the flood; and he hoped that means might be found of paſſing the river higher up, ſo as to fight the marquis de Montcalm upon leſs diſadvantageous terms than thoſe of directly attacking his entrenchments. Accordingly, in reconnoitring the river Montmorenci, a ford was diſcovered about three miles above; but the oppoſite banks, which were naturally ſteep, and covered with woods, the enemy had entrenched in ſuch a manner, as to render it almoſt inacceſſible. The eſcorte was twice attacked by the Indians, who were as often repulſed; but theſe re-encounters coſt the Engliſh about 40 men killed and wounded including ſome officers. Some ſhrewd objections might be ſtarted to the general's choice of ground on this occaſion. He could not act at all without paſſing the river Montmorenci at a very great diſadvantage, and attacking an enemy ſuperior to himſelf in number, ſecured by redoubts and entrenchments. Had he even, by dint of extraordinary valour, driven them from theſe ſtrong poſts, the ſucceſs muſt have coſt him a great number of officers and men; and the enemy might have retreated behind the river St. Charles, which he muſt alſo have paſſed under the ſame diſadvantages, before he could begin his operations againſt the city of Quebeck. Had his good fortune enabled him to ſurmount all theſe difficulties, and after all to defeat the enemy in a pitched battle, the garriſon of Quebeck might have been re enforced by the wrec of their army; and he could not, with any probability of ſucceſs, have undertaken the ſiege of an extenſive fortified place, which he had not troops ſufficient to inveſt, and whoſe garriſon would have been nearly equal in number to the ſum total of the troops he commanded. At any rate, the chance of a fair engagement in the open field was what he had little reaſon to expect in that ſituation, from the known experience and the apparent conduct of the French general. Theſe objections appeared ſo obvious and important, that general Wolfe would not determine to riſque an attac, until he had ſurveyed the upper part of the river St. Laurence, in hopes of finding ſome place more favourable for a deſcent.

On the 18th day of July, the admiral, at his requeſt, ſent two ſhips of war, two armed ſloops, and ſome tranſports, with troops on board, up the river; and they paſſed the city of Quebeck, without having ſuſtained any damage. The general being on board of this little armament, carefully obſerved the banks on the ſide of the enemy, which were extremely difficult from the nature of the ground, and theſe difficulties were redoubled by the foreſight and precaution of the French commander. Though a deſcent ſeemed impracticable between the city and Cape-Rouge, where it was attended, general Wolfe, in order to divide the enemy's force, and procure intelligence, ordered a detachment, under the command of colonel Carlton, to land higher up, at the Point au Tremble, to which place he was informed a great number of the inhabitants of Quebeck had retired with their moſt valuable effects. This ſervice was performed with little loſs and ſome priſoners were brought away, but no magazine was diſcovered. The general thus diſappointed in his expectation, returned to Montmorenci, where brigadier Townſhend had, by maintaining a ſuperior fire acroſs that river, prevented the enemy from erecting a battery, which would have commanded the Engliſh camp; and now he reſolved to attac them, though poſted to great advantage, and every where prepared to give him a warm reception. His deſign was, firſt to reduce a detached redoubt cloſe to the water's edge, ſeemingly ſituated without gun-ſhot of the entrenchment on the hill. Should this fortification be ſupported by the enemy, he foreſaw that he ſhould be able to bring on a general engagement: on the contrary, ſhould they remain tame ſpectators of its reduction, he could afterwards examine their ſituation at leiſure, and determine the place at which they could be moſt eaſily attacked. Preparations were accordingly made for ſtorming the redoubt. On the laſt day of July, in the forenoon, part of brigadier Monckton's brigade was embarked in the boats of the fleet, to be tranſported from the Point of Levi. The two brigades, commanded by the brigadiers Townſhend and Murray, were drawn out, in order to paſs the ford when it ſhould be neceſſary. To facilitate their paſſage, the admiral had ſtationed the Centurion ſhip of war in the channel, to chec the fire of the lower battery, by which the ford was commanded: a numerous train of artillery was placed upon the eminence, to batter and enfilade the left of the enemy's entrenchment; and two flat-bottomed armed veſſels, prepared for the purpoſe, were run a-ground near the redoubt, to favour the deſcent of the forces. The manifeſt confuſion produced among the French by theſe previous meaſures, and by the fire of the Centurion, which was well directed and ſuſtained, determined mr. Wolfe to ſtorm this entrenchment without further delay. Orders were iſſued, that the three brigadiers ſhould put their troops in motion at a certain ſignal, which was accordingly made at a proper time of the tide. Many of the boats from Point Levi ran a-ground upon a ledge that runs off a conſiderable diſtance from the ſhore; and this accident occaſioned a diſorder, by which ſo much time was loſt, that the general was obliged to ſtop the march of brigadier Townſhend's corps, which he perceived to be in motion. In the mean time, the boats were floated, and ranged in proper order, though expoſed to a ſevere fire of ſhot and ſhells; and the general in perſon ſounding the ſhore, pointed out the place where the troops might diſembark with the leaſt difficulty. Thirteen companies of grenadiers, and 200 men of the ſecond American battalion, were the firſt who landed. They had received orders to form in four diſtinct bodies, and begin the attac, ſupported by the corps of brigadier Monckton, as ſoon as the other troops ſhould have paſſed the ford, and be near enough to contribute to their aſſiſtance. Theſe inſtructions, however, were entirely neglected. Before mr. Monckton had landed, and while brigadier Townſhend was on his march at a conſiderable diſtance, the grenadiers, without waiting to be drawn up in any regular form, impetuouſly ruſhed towards the enemy's entrenchments in the utmoſt diſorder. Their courage ſerved only to increaſe their misfortune. The firſt fire they received did ſuch execution among them, that they were obliged to ſhelter themſelves under the redoubt which the French had abandoned at their approach. In this uncomfortable ſituation they remained ſome time, unable to form under ſo hot a fire, notwithſtanding the utmoſt efforts of many gallant officers, who laviſhly expoſed, and even loſt their lives in the honourable diſcharge of their duty[r]. The general ſeeing all their endeavours, abortive, ordered them to retreat, and form behind Monckton's brigade, which was, by this time, landed and drawn up on the beach in order. They accordingly retired in confuſion, leaving a conſiderable number lying on the field, to the barbarity of the Indian ſavages, who maſſacred the living, and ſcalped the dead, even in ſight of their indignant companions. This unhappy accident occaſioned a new delay, and the day was already far advanced. The wind began to blow with uncommon violence, and the tide to make; ſo that, in caſe of a ſecond repulſe, the retreat of brigadier Townſhend might have been rendered hazardous and uncertain; mr. Wolfe, therefore, thought proper to deſiſt, and returned without further moleſtation to the other ſide of the river Montmorenci. The admiral ordered the two veſſels which were a-ground to be ſet on fire, that they might not fall into the hands of the enemy. The advantages that favoured an attac in this part conſiſted of the following particulars: All the artillery could be uſed with good effect; all the troops could act at once; and, in caſe of a miſcarriage, the retreat was ſecure and open, at leaſt for a certain time of the tide. Theſe, however, ſeemed to be over-balanced by other conſiderations. The enemy were poſted on a commanding eminence; the beach was covered with deep mud, ſlippery, and broken into holes and gullies; the hill was ſteep, and in ſome places impracticable; the enemy were numerous, and poured in a very ſevere fire from their entrenchments. Had the attac ſucceeded, the loſs of the Engliſh muſt have been very heavy, and that of the French inconſiderable, becauſe the neighbouring woods afforded them immediate ſhelter; finally, the river St. Charles ſtill remained to be paſſed, before the town could be inveſted.

[r] The following anecdote is ſo remarkable, and tends ſo much to the honour of the Britiſh ſoldiery, that we inſert it without fear of the reader's diſapprobation:—captain Ochterlony and enſign Payton belonged to the regiment of brigadier-general Monckton. They were nearly of an age, which did not exceed 30; the firſt was a North-Briton, the other a native of Ireland. Both were agreeable in perſon, and unblemiſhed in character, and connected together by the ties of mutual friendſhip and eſteem. On the day that preceded the battle, captain Ochterlony had been obliged to fight a duel with a German officer; in which, though he wounded and diſarmed his antagoniſt, yet he himſelf received a dangerous hurt under the right arm, in conſequence of which his friend inſiſted on his remaining in camp during the action of the next day; but his ſpirit was too great to comply with this remonſtrance. He declared it ſhould never be ſaid that a ſcratch received in a private rencounter had prevented him from doing his duty, when his country required his ſervice; and he took the field with a fuſil in his hand, though he was hardly able to carry his arms. In leading up his men to the enemy's entrenchment, he was ſhot through the lungs with a muſquet-ball, an accident which obliged him to part with his fuſil: but he ſtill continued advancing, until, by loſs of blood, he became too weak to proceed farther. About the ſame time mr. Peyton was lamed by a ſhot, which ſhattered the ſmall bone of his left leg. The ſoldiers, in their retreat, earneſtly begged, with tears in their eyes, that captain Ochterlony would allow them to carry him and the enſign off the field. But he was ſo bigotted to a ſevere point of honour, that he would not quit the ground, though he deſired they would take care of his en-

Immediately after this mortifying chec, in which above 500 men, and many brave officers were loſt, the general detached brigadier Murray, with 1200 men, in tranſports, above the town, to co-operate with rear-admiral Holmes, whom the admiral had ſent up with ſome force againſt the French ſhipping, which he hoped to deſtroy. The brigadier was likewiſe inſtructed to ſeize every opportunity of fighting the enemy's detachments, and even of provoking them to battle. In purſuance of theſe directions, he twice attempted to land on the north ſhore; but theſe attempts were unſucceſsful. The third effort was more fortunate. He made a ſudden deſcent at Chambaud, and burned a conſiderable magazine, filled with arms, clothing, proviſion, and ammunition. The enemy's ſhips being ſecured in ſuch a manner as not to be approached, and nothing elſe occurring that required the brigadier's longer ſtay, he returned to the camp, with intelligence obtained from his priſoners, that the fort of Niagara was taken, Crown-Point abandoned, and general Amherſt employed in making preparations to attac the corps at the Iſle aux Noix commanded by M. Burlemaque. The diſaſter at the falls of Montmorenci made a deep impreſſion on the mind of general Wolfe, whoſe ſpirit was too great to brook the moſt diſtant proſpect of cenſure or diſgrace. He knew the character of the Engliſh people, raſh, impatient, and capricious; elevated to exultation by the leaſt gleam of ſucceſs, dejected even to deſpondency by the moſt inconſiderable frown of adverſe fortune; ſanguine even to childiſh hyperbole in applauding thoſe ſervants of the public who have proſpered in their undertakings; clamorous to a degree of perſecution againſt thoſe who have miſcarried in their endeavours, without any inveſtigation of merit, without any conſideration of circumſtances. A keen ſenſe of theſe vexatious peculiarities conſpiring with the ſhame of diſappointment, and eager deſire of retrieving the laurel that he might by ſome be ſuppoſed to have loſt at the falls of Montmorenci, and the deſpair of finding ſuch an occaſion, excited an internal agitation, which viſibly affected his external frame, and diſordered his whole conſtitution, which was naturally delicate and tender. Among thoſe who ſhared his confidence, he was often ſeen to ſigh; he was often heard to complain, and even in the tranſports of this chagrin declare, that he would never return without ſucceſs, to be expoſed, as other unfortunate commanders had been, to the cenſure and reproach of an ignorant and ungrateful populace. This tumult of the mind, added to the fatigues of the body he had undergone, produced a fever and dyſentery; by which, for ſome time, he was totally diſabled.

Before he recovered any degree of ſtrength, he deſired the general officers to conſult together for the public utility. It was their opinion, that the points of Levi and Orleans being left in a proper ſtate of defence, the reſt of the troops ſhould be conveyed up the river; with a view to draw the enemy from their preſent ſituation, and bring them if poſſible to an engagement. This meaſure, however, was not adopted, until the general and admiral had reconnoitred the town of Quebeck, with a view to a general aſſault, and concluded from their own obſervations, re-enforced by the opinion of the chief engineer, who was perfectly well acquainted with the interiors of the place, that ſuch on attac could not be hazarded with any proſpect of ſucceſs. The ſhips of war, indeed, might have ſilenced the batteries of the lower town; but they could not effect the upper works, from which they muſt have ſuſtained conſiderable damage. When we conſider the ſituation of this place, and the fortifications with which it was ſecured, the natural ſtrength of the country; the great number of veſſels and floating batteries they had provided for the defence of the river; the ſkill, valour, ſuperior force, and uncommon vigilance of the enemy; their numerous bodies of ſavages continually hovering about the poſts of the Engliſh, to ſurpriſe parties and harraſs detachments; we muſt own that there was ſuch a combination of difficulties as might have diſcouraged and perplexed the moſt reſolute and intelligent commander.

ſign. Mr Peyton, with a generous diſdain, rejected their good offices, declaring that he would not leave his captain in ſuch a ſituation; and in a little time they remained the ſole ſurvivors on that part of the field.

Captain Ochterlony ſat down by his friend, and, as they expected nothing but immediate death, they took leave of each other; yet they were not altogether abandoned by the hope of being protected as priſoners: for the captain ſeeing a French ſoldier with two Indians approach, ſtarted up, and acoſting them in the French language, which he ſpoke perfectly well, expreſſed his expectation that they would treat him and his companion as officers, priſoners, and gentlemen. The two Indians ſeemed to be entirely under the conduct of the Frenchman, who coming up to mr. Payton, as he ſat on the ground, ſnatched his laced hat from his head, and robbed the captain of his watch and money. This outrage was a ſignal to the Indians for murder and pillage. One of them, clubbing his fireloc, ſtruc at him behind, with a view to knoc him down, but the blow miſſing his head, took place upon his ſhoulder. At the ſame inſtant the other Indian poured his ſhot into the breaſt of this unfortunate young gentleman, who cried out, 'O Peyton! the villain has ſhot me.' Not yet ſatiated with cruelty, the barbarian ſprung upon him, and ſtabbed him in the belly with his ſcalping knife. The captain, having parted with his fuſil, had no weapon for his defence, as none of the officers wore ſwords in the action. The three ruffians, finding him ſtill alive, endeavoured to ſtrangle him with his own ſaſh; and he was now upon his knees ſtruggling againſt them with ſurpriſing exertion. Mr Peyton, at this juncture, having a double-barrelled muſquet in his hand, and ſeeing the diſtreſs of his friend, fired at one of the Indians, who dropped dead upon the ſpot. The other, thinking the enſign would now be an eaſy prey, advanced towards him, and mr. Peyton, having taken good aim at the diſtance of four yards, diſcharged his piece the ſecond time, but it ſeemed to take no effect. The ſavage fired in his turn, and wounded the enſign in the ſhoulder; then ruſhing upon him, thruſt his bayonet through his body. He repeated the blow, which mr. Peyton attempting to parry, received another wound in his left hand, nevertheleſs he ſeized the Indian's muſket with the ſame hand, pulled him forwards, and with his right drawing a dagger which hung by his ſide, plunged it in the barbarian's ſide. A violent ſtruggle enſued: but at length mr. Peyton was uppermoſt, and with repeated ſtrokes of his dagger, killed his antagoniſt outright. Here he was ſeized with an unaccountable emotion of curioſity, to know whether or not his ſhot had taken place on the body of the Indian; he accordingly turned him up, and ſtripping off his blanket, perceived that the ball had penetrated quite through the cavity of the breaſt. Having thus obtained a dear-bought victory, he ſtarted up on one leg, and ſaw captain Ochterlony ſtanding at the diſtance of 60 yards, cloſe by the enemy's breaſt-work, with the French ſoldier attending him. Mr Peyton then called aloud, 'Captain Ochterlony, I am glad to ſee you have at laſt got under protection. Beware of that villian, who is more barbarous than the ſavages. God bleſs you, my dear captain, I ſee a party of Indians coming this way, and expect to be murdered immediately.' A number of theſe barbarians had for ſome time been employed on the left in ſcalping and pillaging the dying and the dead that were left upon the field of battle: and above 30 of them were in full march to deſtroy mr. Peyton. This gentleman knew he had no mercy to expect; for ſhould his life be ſpared for the preſent, they would have afterwards inſiſted upon ſacrificing him to the names of their brethren whom he had ſlain; and in that caſe he would have been put to death by the moſt excruciating tortures. Full of this idea, he ſnatched up his muſket, and, notwithſtanding his broken leg, ran above 40 yards without halting: feeling himſelf now totally diſabled, and incapable of proceeding one ſtep further, he loaded his piece, and preſented it to the two foremoſt Indians, who ſtood aloof, waiting to be joined by their fellows: while the French from their breaſt-works, kept up a continual fire of cannon and ſmall arms upon their poor, ſolitary, maimed gentlemen. In this uncomfortable ſituation he ſtood, when he diſcerned at a diſtance a Highland officer, with a party of his men, ſkirting the plain towards the field of battle. He forthwith waved his hand in ſignal of diſtreſs, and being perceived by the officer, he detached three of his men to his aſſiſtance. Theſe brave fellows haſtened to him through the midſt of a terrible fire, and one of them bore him off on his ſhoulders. The Highland officer was captain Macdonald, of colonel Frazier's battalion; who underſtanding that a young gentleman, his kinſman, had dropped on the field of battle, had put himſelf at the head of this party, with which he penetrated to the middle of the field, drove a conſiderable number of the French and Indians before him, and finding his relation ſtill unſcalped, carried him off in triumph. Poor captain Ochterlony was conveyed to Quebeck, where in a few days he died of his wounds. After the reduction of that place, the French ſurgeons who attended him declared, that, in all probability, he would have recovered of the two ſhots he had received in his breaſt, had not he been mortally wounded in the belly by the Indian's ſcalping knife.

As this very remarkable ſcene was acted in ſight of both armies, general Townſhend, in the ſequel, expoſtulated with the French officers upon the inhumanity of keeping up ſuch a ſevere fire againſt two wounded gentlemen, who were diſabled and deſtitute of all hope of eſcaping. They anſwered, that the fire was not made by the regulars, but by the Canadians and ſavages whom it was not in the power of diſcipline to reſtrain.

In conſequence of the reſolution taken to quit the camp at Montmorenci the troops and artillery were re-embarked, and landed at Point Levi: they afterwards paſſed up the river in tranſports, while admiral Holmes made a movement with his ſhips, to amuſe the enemy poſted on the north ſhore: and the men being much crowded on board, the general ordered one half of them to be landed for refreſhment on the other ſide of the river. As no poſſibility appeared of annoying the enemy above the town the ſcheme of operations was totally changed. A plan was formed for conveying the troops farther down in boats and landing them in the night within a league of Cape Diamond in hopes of aſcending the heighths of Abraham which riſe abruptly with a ſteep aſcent from the banks of the river, that they might take poſſeſſion of the ground on the bac of the city where it was but indifferently fortified. The dangers and difficulties attending the execution of this deſign were ſo peculiarly diſcouraging, that one would imagine it could not have been embraced but by a ſpirit of enterprize that bordered on deſperation. The ſtream was rapid; the ſhore ſhelving; the bank of the river lined with ſentinels; the landing-place ſo narrow as to be eaſily miſſed in the dark; and the ground ſo difficult as hardly to be ſurmounted in the day-time, had no oppoſition been expected. If the enemy had received the leaſt intimation from ſpy or deſerter, or even ſuſpected the ſcheme: had the embarkation been diſordered, in conſequence of the darkneſs of the night, the rapidity of the river, or the ſhelving nature of the north ſhore, near which they were obliged to row: had one ſentinel been alarmed, or the landing-place much miſtaken, the heights of Abraham muſt have been inſtantly ſecured by ſuch a force as would have rendered the undertaking abhortive: confuſion would neceſſarily have enſued in the dark; and this would have naturally produced a panic, which might have proved fatal to the greater part of the detachment. Theſe objections could not eſcape the penetrations of the gallant Wolfe, who, nevertheleſs, adopted the plan without heſitation; and even executed it in perſon; though at that time labouring under a ſevere dyſentery and fever, which had exhauſted his conſtitution, and reduced him almoſt to an extremity of weakneſs. The previous ſteps being taken, and the time fixed for this hazardous attempt, admiral Holmes moved with his ſquadron further up the river, about three leagues above the place appointed for the diſembarkation, that he might deceive the enemy, and amuſe M. de Bouganville, whom Montcalm had detached with 1500 men to watch the motions of that ſquadron; but the Engliſh admiral was directed to ſail down the river in the night, ſo as to protect the landing of the forces; and theſe orders he punctually fulfilled. On the 12th day of September, an hour after midnight, the firſt embarkation, conſiſting of four complete regiments, the light infantry, commanded by colonel Howe, a detachment of Highlanders, and American grenadiers, was made in flat-bottomed boats, under the immediate command of brigadiers Monckton and Murray; though general Wolfe accompanied them in perſon, and was among the firſt who had landed; and they began to fall down with the tide, to the intended place of diſembarkation; rowing cloſe to the north ſhore, in order to find it more eaſily. Without any diſorder the boats glided gently along; but the rapidity of the tide, and the darkneſs of the night, the boats over-ſhot the mark, and the troops landed a little below the place at which the diſembarkation was intended [s]. As the troops landed, the boats were ſent bac for the ſecond embarkation, which was ſuperintended by brigadier Townſhend. In the mean time colonel Howe, with the light infantry and the Highlanders, aſcended the woody precipices with admirable courage and activity; and diſlodged a ſerjeant's guard, which defended a ſmall entrenched narrow path, by which alone the reſt of the forces could reach the ſummit. Then they mounted, without further moleſtation from the enemy, and the general drew them up in order as they arrived, monſieur de Montcalm no ſooner underſtood that the Engliſh had gained the heighths of Abraham, which in a manner commanded the town on its weakeſt part, then he reſolved to hazard a battle, and began his march without delay, after having collected his whole force from the ſide of Beauport.

General Wolfe, perceiving the enemy croſſing the river St. Charles, began to form his own line, which conſiſted of ſix battalions and the Louſbourg grenadiers; the right commanded by brigadier Monckton, and the left by brigadier Murray; to the rear of the left colonel Howe was poſted with his light infantry, juſt returned from a four-gun battery, which they had taken without oppoſition. M. de Montcalm advancing in ſuch a manner as to ſhow his intention was to flank the left of the Engliſh, brigadier Townſhend was ſent thither with the regiment of Amherſt, which he formed en potence, preſenting a double front to the enemy: he was afterwards re-enforced by two battalions, and the reſerve conſiſted of one regiment drawn up in eight ſubdiviſions, with large intervals. The right of the enemy was compoſed of half the colony troops, two battalions, and a body of Canadians and ſavages; their centre conſiſted of a column, formed by two other regular battalions; and on the left one battalion, with the remainder of the colony troops, was poſted; the buſhes and cornfields in their front were lined with 1500 of their beſt markſmen, who kept up an irregular galling fire, which proved fatal to many brave officers, thus ſingled out for deſtruction. This fire, indeed, was in ſome meaſure checked by the advanced poſts of the Britiſh line, who piqueered with the enemy for ſome hours before the battle began. Both armies were deſtitute of artillery, except two ſmall pieces on the ſide of the French, and a ſingle gun, which the Engliſh ſeamen had made ſhift to draw up from the landing-place. This was very well ſerved, and galled their column ſeverely. At length, about nine in the morning, the enemy advanced to the charge with great order and vivacity, though their fire was irregular and ineffectual. On the contrary the Britiſh forces reſerved their ſhot until the French had approached within 40 yards of their line; then they poured in a terrible diſcharge, and continued the fire with ſuch deliberation and ſpirit, as could not fail to produce a very conſiderable effect. General Wolfe was ſtationed on the right, at the head of Bragg's regiment and the Loiſbourg grenadiers, where the attac was moſt warm. As he ſtood conſpicuous in the front of the line, he had been aimed at by the enemy's markſmen, and received a ſhot in the riſt, which, however, did not oblige him to quit the field. Having wrapped a handkerchief round his hand, he continued giving orders without the leaſt emotion, and advanced at the head of the grenadiers, with their bayonets fixed, when another ball unfortunately pierced the breaſt of the young hero [t], who fell in

[s] How far the ſucceſs of this attempt depended upon accident may be conceived from the following particulars:—In the twilight two French deſerters were carried on board a ſhip of war, commanded by captain Smith, and lying at anchor near the north ſhore. They told him that the garriſon of Quebeck expected that night to receive a convoy of proviſions, ſent down the river in boats, from the detachment above, commanded by M. de Bougainville. Theſe deſerters ſtanding upon dec, and perceiving the Engliſh boats with the troops gliding down the river in the dark, began to ſhoot, and make a noiſe, declaring they were part of the expected convoy. Captain Smith, who was ignorant of general Wolfe's deſign, believing their eſtimation, had actually given orders to point the guns at the Britiſh troops; when the general perceiving a commotion on board, rowed along-ſide in perſon, and prevented the diſcharge, which would have alarmed the town, and entirely fruſtrated the attempt.

The French had poſted ſentries along ſhore, to challenge boats and veſſels, and give the alarm occaſionally. The firſt boat that contained the Engliſh troops being queſtioned accordingly, a captain of Fraſer's regiment, who had ſerved in Holland, and who was perfectly acquainted with the French language and cuſtoms, anſwered without heſitation to 'qui vit,' which is their challenging word, 'la France:' nor was he at a loſs to anſwer the ſecond queſtion, which was much more particular and difficult. When the ſentinel demanded 'à quel regiment? to what regiment?' the captain replied, 'de la Reine,' which he knew, by accident, to be one of thoſe that compoſed the body commanded by Bougainville. The ſoldier took it for granted this was the expected convoy; and ſaying, 'paſſe,' allowed all the boats to proceed without further queſtion. In the ſame manner the other ſenteries were deceived, though one, more wary than the reſt, came running down to the water's edge, and called, 'pourquoy eſt que vous ne parlex plus haut? Why don't you ſpeak with an audable voice?' To this interrogation, which implied doubt, the captain anſwered, with admirable preſence of mind, in a ſoft tone of voice, 'Tai toi, nous ſerons entendues! Huſh! we ſhall be overheard and diſcovered.' Thus cautioned, the ſentry retired without further altercation. The midſhipman who piloted the firſt boat, paſſing by the landing-place in the dark, the ſame captain who knew it, from his having been poſted formerly with his company on the other ſide of the river, inſiſted upon the pilot's being miſtaken, and commanded the rowers to be put aſhore in the proper place, or at leaſt very near it.

When general Wolfe landed and ſaw the difficulty of aſcending the precipice, he ſaid to the ſame officer, in a familiar ſtrain, 'I don't believe there is any poſſibility of getting up; but you muſt do your endeavour.' The narrow path that ſlanted up the hill from the landing-place the enemy had broken up and rendered impaſſable by croſs ditches, beſides the intrenchment at the top: in every other part the hill was ſo ſteep and dangerous, that the ſoldiers were obliged to pull themſelves up by the roots and boughs of trees growing on both ſides of the path.

[t] When the fatal ball took place general Wolfe, finding himſelf unable to ſtand, leaned upon the ſhoulder of a lieutenant, who ſat down for that purpoſe. This officer ſeeing the French give way, exclaimed, 'They run! they run!'—'Who run?' cried the gallant Wolfe, with great eagerneſs. When the lieutenant replied. 'the French.'—'What! (ſaid he) do the cowards run already? Then I die happy.' So ſaying, the glorious youth expired.

brigade, which was, by this time, landed and drawn up on the beach in order. They accordingly retired in confuſion, leaving a conſiderable number lying on the field, to the barbarity of the Indian ſavages, who maſſacred the living, and ſcalped the dead, even in ſight of their indignant companions. This unhappy accident occaſioned a new delay, and the day was already far advanced. The wind began to blow with uncommon violence, and the tide to make; ſo that, in caſe of a ſecond repulſe, the retreat of brigadier Townſhend might have been rendered hazardous and uncertain; mr. Wolfe, therefore, thought proper to deſiſt, and returned without further moleſtation to the other ſide of the river Montmorenci. The admiral ordered the two veſſels which were a-ground to be ſet on fire, that they might not fall into the hands of the enemy. The advantages that favoured an attac in this part conſiſted of the following particulars: All the artillery could be uſed with good effect; all the troops could act at once; and, in caſe of a miſcarriage, the retreat was ſecure and open, at leaſt for a certain time of the tide. Theſe, however, ſeemed to be over-balanced by other conſiderations. The enemy were poſted on a commanding eminence; the beach was covered with deep mud, ſlippery, and broken into holes and gullies; the hill was ſteep, and in ſome places impracticable; the enemy were numerous, and poured in a very ſevere fire from their entrenchments. Had the attac ſucceeded, the loſs of the Engliſh muſt have been very heavy, and that of the French inconſiderable, becauſe the neighbouring woods afforded them immediate ſhelter; finally, the river St. Charles ſtill remained to be paſſed, before the town could be inveſted.

Immediately after this mortifying chec, in which above 500 men, and many brave officers were loſt, the general detached brigadier Murray, with 1200 men, in tranſports, above the town, to co-operate with rear-admiral Holmes, whom the admiral had ſent up with ſome force againſt the French ſhipping, which he hoped to deſtroy. The brigadier was likewiſe inſtructed to ſeize every opportunity of fighting the enemy's detachments, and even of provoking them to battle. In purſuance of theſe directions, he twice attempted to land on the north ſhore; but theſe attempts were unſucceſsful. The third effort was more fortunate. He made a ſudden deſcent at Chambaud, and burned a conſiderable magazine, filled with arms, clothing, proviſion, and ammunition. The enemy's ſhips being ſecured in ſuch a manner as not to be approached, and nothing elſe occurring that required the brigadier's longer ſtay, he returned to the camp, with intelligence obtained from his priſoners, that the fort of Niagara was taken, Crown-Point abandoned, and general Amherſt employed in making preparations to attac the corps at the Iſle aux Noix commanded by M. Burlemaque. The diſaſter at the falls of Montmorenci made a deep impreſſion on the mind of general Wolfe, whoſe ſpirit was too great to brook the moſt diſtant proſpect of cenſure or diſgrace. He knew the character of the Engliſh people, raſh, impatient, and capricious; elevated to exultation by the leaſt gleam of ſucceſs, dejected even to deſpondency by the moſt inconſiderable frown of adverſe fortune; ſanguine even to childiſh hyperbole in applauding thoſe ſervants of the public who have proſpered in their undertakings; clamorous to a degree of perſecution againſt thoſe who have miſcarried in their endeavours, without any inveſtigation of merit, without any conſideration of circumſtances. A keen ſenſe of theſe vexatious peculiarities conſpiring with the ſhame of diſappointment, and eager deſire of retrieving the laurel that he might by ſome be ſuppoſed to have loſt at the falls of Montmorenci, and the deſpair of finding ſuch an occaſion, excited an internal agitation, which viſibly affected his external frame, and diſordered his whole conſtitution, which was naturally delicate and tender. Among thoſe who ſhared his confidence, he was often ſeen to ſigh; he was often heard to complain, and even in the tranſports of this chagrin declare, that he would never return without ſucceſs, to be expoſed, as other unfortunate commanders had been, to the cenſure and reproach of an ignorant and ungrateful populace. This tumult of the mind, added to the fatigues of the body he had undergone, produced a fever and dyſentery; by which, for ſome time, he was totally diſabled.

Before he recovered any degree of ſtrength, he deſired the general officers to conſult together for the public utility. It was their opinion, that the points of Levi and Orleans being left in a proper ſtate of defence, the reſt of the troops ſhould be conveyed up the river; with a view to draw the enemy from their preſent ſituation, and bring them if poſſible to an engagement. This meaſure, however, was not adopted, until the general and admiral had reconnoitred the town of Quebeck, with a view to a general aſſault, and concluded from their own obſervations, re-enforced by the opinion of the chief engineer, who was perfectly well acquainted with the interiors of the place, that ſuch an attac could not be hazarded with any proſpect of ſucceſs. The ſhips of war, indeed, might have ſilenced the batteries of the lower town; but they could not effect the upper works, from which they muſt have ſuſtained conſiderable damage. When we conſider the ſituation of this place, and the fortifications with which it was ſecured, the natural ſtrength of the country; the great number of veſſels and floating batteries they had provided for the defence of the river; the ſkill, valour, ſuperior force, and uncommon vigilance of the enemy; their numerous bodies of ſavages continually hovering about the poſts of the Engliſh, to ſurpriſe parties and harraſs detachments; we muſt own that there was ſuch a combination of difficulties as might have diſcouraged and perplexed the moſt reſolute and intelligent commander.

ſign. Mr Peyton, with a generous diſdain, rejected their good offices, declaring that he would not leave his captain in ſuch a ſituation; and in a little time they remained the ſole ſurvivors on that part of the field.

Captain Ochterlony ſat down by his friend, and, as they expected nothing but immediate death, they took leave of each other; yet they were not altogether abandoned by the hope of being protected as priſoners: for the captain ſeeing a French ſoldier with two Indians approach, ſtarted up, and accoſting them in the French language, which he ſpoke perfectly well, expreſſed his expectation that they would treat him and his companion as officers, priſoners, and gentlemen. The two Indians ſeemed to be entirely under the conduct of the Frenchman, who coming up to mr. Payton, as he ſat on the ground, ſnatched his laced hat from his head, and robbed the captain of his watch and money. This outrage was a ſignal to the Indians for murder and pillage. One of them, clubbing his fireloc, ſtruc at him behind, with a view to knoc him down, but the blow miſſing his head, took place upon his ſhoulder. At the ſame inſtant the other Indian poured his ſhot into the breaſt of this unfortunate young gentleman, who cried out, 'O Peyton! the villain has ſhot me.' Not yet ſatiated with cruelty, the barbarian ſprung upon him, and ſtabbed him in the belly with his ſcalping knife. The captain, having parted with his fuſil, had no weapon for his defence, as none of the officers wore ſwords in the action. The three ruffians, finding him ſtill alive, endeavoured to ſtrangle him with his own ſaſh; and he was now upon his knees ſtruggling againſt them with ſurpriſing exertion. Mr Peyton, at this juncture, having a double-barrelled muſquet in his hand, and ſeeing the diſtreſs of his friend, fired at one of the Indians, who dropped dead upon the ſpot. The other, thinking the enſign would now be an eaſy prey, advanced towards him, and mr. Peyton, having taken good aim at the diſtance of four yards, diſcharged his piece the ſecond time, but it ſeemed to take no effect. The ſavage fired in his turn, and wounded the enſign in the ſhoulder; then ruſhing upon him, thruſt his bayonet through his body. He repeated the blow, which mr. Peyton attempting to parry, received another wound in his left hand, nevertheleſs he ſeized the Indian's muſket with the ſame hand, pulled him forwards, and with his right drawing a dagger which hung by his ſide, plunged it in the barbarian's ſide. A violent ſtruggle enſued: but at length mr. Peyton was uppermoſt, and with repeated ſtrokes of his dagger, killed his antagoniſt outright, Here he was ſeized with an unaccountable emotion of curioſity, to know whether or not his ſhot had taken place on the body of the Indian; he accordingly turned him up, and ſtripping off his blanket, perceived that the ball had penetrated quite through the cavity of the breaſt. Having thus obtained a dear-bought victory, he ſtarted up on one leg, and ſaw captain Ochterlony ſtanding at the diſtance of 60 yards, cloſe by the enemy's breaſt-work, with the French ſoldier attending him. Mr Peyton then called aloud, 'Captain Ochterlony, I am glad to ſee you have at laſt got under protection. Beware of that villian, who is more barbarous than the ſavages. God bleſs you, my dear captain, I ſee a party of Indians coming this way, and expect to be murdered immediately.' A number of thoſe barbarians had for ſome time been employed on the left in ſcalping and pilliaging the dying and the dead that were left upon the field of battle: and above 30 of them were in full march to deſtroy mr. Peyton. This gentleman knew he had no mercy to expect; for ſhould his life be ſpared for the preſent, they would have afterwards inſiſted upon ſacrificing him to the names of their brethren whom he had ſlain; and in that caſe he would have been put to death by the moſt excruciating tortures. Full of this idea, he ſnatched up his muſket, and, notwithſtanding his broken leg, ran above 40 yards without halting: feeling himſelf now totally diſabled, and incapable of proceeding one ſtep further, he loaded his piece, and preſented it to the two foremoſt Indians, who ſtood aloof, waiting to be joined by their fellows: while the French from their breaſt-works, kept up a continual fire of cannon and ſmall arms upon their poor, ſolitary, maimed gentlemen. In this uncomfortable ſituation he ſtood, when he diſcerned at a diſtance a Highland officer, with a party of his men, ſkirting the plain towards the field of battle. He forthwith waved his hand in ſignal of diſtreſs, and being perceived by the officer, he detached three of his men to his aſſiſtance. Theſe brave fellows haſtened to him through the midſt of a terrible fire, and one of them bore him off on his ſhoulders. The Highland officer was captain Macdonald, of colonel Frazier's battalion; who underſtanding that a young gentleman, his kinſman, had dropped on the field of battle, had put himſelf at the head of this party, with which he penetrated to the middle of the field, drove a conſiderable number of the French and Indians before him, and finding his relation ſtill unſcalped, carried him off in triumph. Poor captain Ochterlony was conveyed to Quebeck, where in a few days he died of his wounds. After the reduction of that place, the French ſurgeons who attended him declared, that, in all probability, he would have recovered of the two ſhots he had received in his breaſt, had not he been mortally wounded in the belly by the Indian's ſcalping knife.

As this very remarkable ſcene was acted in ſight of both armies, general Townſhend, in the ſequel, expoſtulated with the French officers upon the inhumanity of keeping up ſuch a ſevere fire againſt two wounded gentlemen, who were diſabled and deſtitute of all hope of eſcaping. They anſwered, that the fire was not made by the regulars, but by the Canadians and ſavages whom it was not in the power of diſcipline to reſtrain.

In conſequence of the reſolution taken to quit the camp at Montmorenci the troops and artillery were re-embarked, and landed at Point Levi: they afterwards paſſed up the river in tranſports, while admiral Holmes made a movement with his ſhips, to amuſe the enemy poſted on the north ſhore: and the men being much crowded on board, the general ordered one half of them to be landed for refreſhment on the other ſide of the river. As no poſſibility appeared of annoying the enemy above the town the ſcheme of operations was totally changed. A plan was formed for conveying the troops farther down in boats and landing them in the night within a league of Cape Diamond in hopes of aſcending the heighths of Abraham which riſe abruptly with a ſteep aſcent from the banks of the river, that they might take poſſeſſion of the ground on the bac of the city where it was but indifferently fortified. The dangers and difficulties attending the execution of this deſign were ſo peculiarly diſcouraging, that one would imagine it could not have been embraced but by a ſpirit of enterprize that bordered on deſperation. The ſtream was rapid; the ſhore ſhelving; the bank of the river lined with ſentinels; the landing-place ſo narrow as to be eaſily miſſed in the dark; and the ground ſo difficult as hardly to be ſurmounted in the day-time, had no oppoſition been expected. If the enemy had received the leaſt intimation from ſpy or deſerter, or even ſuſpected the ſcheme: had the embarkation been diſordered, in conſequence of the darkneſs of the night, the rapidity of the river, or the ſhelving nature of the north ſhore, near which they were obliged to row: had one ſentinel been alarmed, or the landing-place much miſtaken, the heights of Abraham muſt have been inſtantly ſecured by ſuch a force as would have rendered the undertaking abhortive: confuſion would neceſſarily have enſued in the dark; and this would have naturally produced a panic, which might have proved fatal to the greater part of the detachment. Theſe objections could not eſcape the penetrations of the gallant Wolfe, who, nevertheleſs, adopted the plan without heſitation; and even executed it in perſon; though at that time labouring under a ſevere dyſentery and fever, which had exhauſted his conſtitution, and reduced him almoſt to an extremity of weakneſs. The previous ſteps being taken, and the time fixed for this hazardous attempt, admiral Holmes moved with his ſquadron further up the river, about three leagues above the place appointed for the diſembarkation, that he might deceive the enemy, and amuſe M. de Bouganville, whom Montcalm had detached with 1500 men to watch the motions of that ſquadron; but the Engliſh admiral was directed to ſail down the river in the night, ſo as to protect the landing of the forces; and theſe orders he punctually fulfilled. On the 12th day of September, an hour after midnight, the firſt embarkation, conſiſting of four complete regiments, the light infantry, commanded by colonel Howe, a detachment of Highlanders, and American grenadiers, was made in flat-bottomed boats, under the immediate command of brigadiers Monckton and Murray; though general Wolfe accompanied them in perſon, and was among the firſt who had landed; and they began to fall down with the tide, to the intended place of diſembarkation; rowing cloſe to the north ſhore, in order to find it more eaſily. Without any diſorder the boats glided gently along; but the rapidity of the tide, and the darkneſs of the night, the boats over-ſhot the mark, and the troops landed a little below the place at which the diſembarkation was intended [s]. As the troops landed, the boats were ſent bac for the ſecond embarkation, which was ſuperintended by brigadier Townſhend. In the mean time colonel Howe, with the light infantry and the Highlanders, aſcended the woody precipices with admirable courage and activity; and diſlodged a ſerjeant's guard, which defended a ſmall entrenched narrow path, by which alone the reſt of the forces could reach the ſummit. Then they mounted, without further moleſtation from the enemy, and the general drew them up in order as they arrived, monſieur de Montcalm no ſooner underſtood that the Engliſh had gained the heighths of Abraham, which in a manner commanded the town on its weakeſt part, then he reſolved to hazard a battle, and began his march without delay, after having collected his whole force from the ſide of Beauport.

General Wolfe, perceiving the enemy croſſing the river St. Charles, began to form his own line, which conſiſted of ſix battalions and the Louſbourg grenadiers; the right commanded by brigadier Monckton, and the left by brigadier Murray; to the rear of the left colonel Howe was poſted with his light infantry, juſt returned from a four-gun battery, which they had taken without oppoſition. M. de Montcalm advancing in ſuch a manner as to ſhow his intention was to flank the left of the Engliſh, brigadier Townſhend was ſent thither with the regiment of Amherſt, which he formed en potence, preſenting a double front to the enemy: he was afterwards re-enforced by two battalions, and the reſerve conſiſted of one regiment drawn up in eight ſubdiviſions, with large intervals. The right of the enemy was compoſed of half the colony troops, two battalions, and a body of Canadians and ſavages; their centre conſiſted of a column, formed by two other regular battalions; and on the left one battalion, with the remainder of the colony troops, was poſted; the buſhes and cornfields in their front were lined with 1500 of their beſt markſmen, who kept up an irregular galling fire, which proved fatal to many brave officers, thus ſingled out for deſtruction. This fire, indeed, was in ſome meaſure checked by the advanced poſts of the Britiſh line, who piqueered with the enemy for ſome hours before the battle began. Both armies were deſtitute of artillery, except two ſmall pieces on the ſide of the French, and a ſingle gun, which the Engliſh ſeamen had made ſhift to draw up from the landing-place. This was very well ſerved, and galled their column ſeverely. At length, about nine in the morning, the enemy advanced to the charge with great order and vivacity, though their fire was irregular and ineffectual. On the contrary the Britiſh forces reſerved their ſhot until the French had approached within 40 yards of their line; then they poured in a terrible diſcharge, and continued the fire with ſuch deliberation and ſpirit, as could not fail to produce a very conſiderable effect. General Wolfe was ſtationed on the right, at the head of Bragg's regiment and the Loiſbourg grenadiers, where the attac was moſt warm. As he ſtood conſpicuous in the front of the line, he had been aimed at by the enemy's markſmen, and received a ſhot in the riſt, which, however, did not oblige him to quit the field. Having wrapped a handkerchief round his hand, he continued giving orders without the leaſt emotion, and advanced at the head of the grenadiers, with their bayonets fixed, when another ball unfortunately pierced the breaſt of the young hero [t], who fell in

[s] How far the ſucceſs of this attempt depended upon accident may be conceived from the following particulars:—In the twilight two French deſerters were carried on board a ſhip of war, commanded by captain Smith, and lying at anchor near the north ſhore. They told him that the garriſon of Quebeck expected that night to receive a convoy of proviſions, ſent down the river in boats, from the detachment above, commanded by M. de Bougainville. Theſe deſerters ſtanding upon dec, and perceiving the Engliſh boats with the troops gliding down the river in the dark, began to ſhoot, and make a noiſe, declaring they were part of the expected convoy. Captain Smith, who was ignorant of general Wolfe's deſign, believing their eſtimation, had actually given orders to point the guns at the Britiſh troops; when the general perceiving a commotion on board, rowed along-ſide in perſon, and prevented the diſcharge, which would have alarmed the town, and entirely fruſtrated the attempt.

The French had poſted ſentries along ſhore, to challenge boats and veſſels, and give the alarm occaſionally. The firſt boat that contained the Engliſh troops being queſtioned accordingly, a captain of Fraſer's regiment, who had ſerved in Holland, and who was perfectly acquainted with the French language and cuſtoms, anſwered without heſitation to 'qui vit,' which is their challenging word, 'la France:' nor was he at a loſs to anſwer the ſecond queſtion, which was much more particular and difficult. When the ſentinel demanded 'à quel regiment? to what regiment?' the captain replied, 'de la Reine,' which he knew, by accident, to be one of thoſe that compoſed the body commanded by Bougainville. The ſoldier took it for granted this was the expected convoy; and ſaying, 'paſſe,' allowed all the boats to proceed without further queſtion. In the ſame manner the other ſenteries were deceived, though one, more wary than the reſt, came running down to the water's edge, and called, 'pourquoy eſt que vous ne parlex plus haut? Why don't you ſpeak with an audable voice?' To this interrogation, which implied doubt, the captain anſwered, with admirable preſence of mind, in a ſoft tone of voice, 'Tai toi, nous ſerons entendues! Huſh! we ſhall be overheard and diſcovered.' Thus cautioned, the ſentry retired without further altercation. The midſhipman who piloted the firſt boat, paſſing by the landing-place in the dark, the ſame captain who knew it, from his having been poſted formerly with his company on the other ſide of the river, inſiſted upon the pilot's being miſtaken, and commanded the rowers to be put aſhore in the proper place, or at leaſt very near it.

When general Wolfe landed and ſaw the difficulty of aſcending the precipice, he ſaid to the ſame officer, in a familiar ſtrain, 'I don't believe there is any poſſibility of getting up; but you muſt do your endeavour.' The narrow path that ſlanted up the hill from the landing-place the enemy had broken up and rendered impaſſable by croſs ditches, beſides the intrenchment at the top: in every other part the hill was ſo ſteep and dangerous, that the ſoldiers were obliged to pull themſelves up by the roots and boughs of trees growing on both ſides of the path.

[t] When the fatal ball took place general Wolfe, finding himſelf unable to ſtand, leaned upon the ſhoulder of a lieutenant, who ſat down for that purpoſe. This officer ſeeing the French give way, exclaimed, 'They run! they run!'—'Who run?' cried the gallant Wolfe, with great eagerneſs. When the lieutenant replied. 'the French.'—'What! (ſaid he) do the cowards run already? Then I die happy.' So ſaying, the glorious youth expired.

the arms of victory, juſt as the enemy gave way. At this very inſtant, every ſeparate regiment of the Britiſh army ſeemed to exert itſelf for the honour of its own peculiar character. While the right preſſed on with their bayonets, brigadier Murray briſkly advanced with the troops under his command, and ſoon broke the centre of the enemy: then the Highlanders drawing their broad ſwords, fell in among them with irreſiſtible impetuoſity, and drove them with great ſlaughter into the town, and the works they had raiſed at the bridge of the river St. Charles. On the left and rear of the Engliſh, the action was not ſo violent. Some of the light infantry had thrown themſelves into houſes, where being attacked, they defended themſelves with great courage and reſolution. Colonel Howe having taken poſt with two companies behind a ſmall copſe, ſallied out frequently on the flanks of the enemy, during this attac, and often drove them into heaps; while brigadier Townſhend advanced platoons againſt their front: ſo that the right wing of the French were totally prevented from executing their firſt intentions. The brigadier himſelf remained with Amherſt's regiment, to ſupport this diſpoſition, and to over-awe a body of ſavages, poſted oppoſite to the light infantry, waiting for an opportunity to fall upon the rear of the Britiſh army. General Wolfe being ſlain, and at the ſame time, mr. Monckton dangerouſly wounded at the head of Laſceiles's regiment, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf with remarkable gallantry, the command devolved on brigadier Townſhend, who haſtened to the centre, and finding the troops diſordered in the purſuit, formed them again with all poſſible expedition. This neceſſary taſk was ſcarce performed, when M. de Bougainville, with a body of 2000 freſh men appeared in the rear of the Engliſh. He had begun his march from Cape-Rouge as ſoon as he received intelligence that the Britiſh troops had gained the heights of Abraham, but did not come up in time to have any ſhare in the battle. Mr Townſhend immediately ordered two battalions, with two pieces of artillery, to advance againſt this officer, who retired at their approach, among woods and ſwamps, where general Townſhend very wiſely declined hazarding a precarious attac. He had already obtained a complete victory, taken a great number of French officers, and was poſſeſſed of a very advantageous ſituation, which it would have been imprudent to forego. The French general, M. de Montcalm, was mortally wounded in the battle, and conveyed into Quebeck, from whence, before he died, he wrote a letter to general Townſhend, recommending the priſoners to that generous humanity by which the Britiſh nation is diſtinguiſhed. His ſecond in command was left wounded on the field, and next day expired on board an Engliſh ſhip, to which he had been conveyed. About 1000 of the enemy were made priſoners, including a great number of officers, and above 500 were ſlain on the field of battle. The wrec of their army, after they had re-enforced the garriſon of Quebeck, retired to Point-au-Tremble, from whence they proceeded to Jacques Quartiers, where they remained entrenched, until they were compelled by the ſeverity of weather to make the beſt of their way to Trois Rivieres and Montreal. This important victory was obtained at the expence of 50 men killed, including nine officers; and of about 500 men wounded; but the death of general Wolfe was a national loſs, univerſally lamented. He inherited from nature an animating fervour of ſentiment, an intuitive perception, an extenſive capacity, and a paſſion for glory, which ſtimulated him to acquire every ſpecies of military knowledge that ſtudy could comprehend, that actual ſervice could illuſtrate and confirm. This noble warmth of diſpoſition ſeldom fails to call forth and unfold the liberal virtues of the ſoul. Brave above all eſtimation of danger, he was alſo generous, gentle, complaiſant, and humane; the pattern of the officer, the darling of the ſoldier: there was a ſublimity of his genius, which ſored above the pitch of ordinary minds; and had his faculties been exerciſed to their full extent by opportunity and action; had his judgement been fully matured by age and experience, he would, without doubt, have rivalled in reputation the moſt celebrated captains of antiquity.

Immediately after the battle of Quebeck, admiral Saunders, who, together with his ſubordinates, Durell and Holmes, had all along co-operated heartily with the land-forces for the advantage of the ſervice, ſent up all the boats of the fleet, with artillery and ammunition; and on the 17th day of the month ſailed up, with all the ſhips of war, in a diſpoſition to attac the lower town, while the upper part ſhould be aſſaulted by general Townſhend. This gentleman had employed the time from the day of action in ſecuring the camp with redoubts, in forming a military road for the cannon, in drawing up the artillery, preparing batteries, and cutting off the enemy's communication with the country. On the 17th, before any battery could be finiſhed, a flag of truce was ſent from the town with propoſals of capitulation; which, being maturely conſidered by the general and admiral, were accepted, and ſigned at eight next morning. They granted the more favourable terms, as the enemy continued to aſſemble in the rear of the Britiſh army; as the ſeaſon was become wet, ſtormy, and cold; threatening the troops with ſickneſs and the fleet with accident, and as a conſiderable advantage would reſult from taking poſſeſſion of the town while the walls were in a ſtate of defence. What rendered the capitulation ſtill more fortunate for the Britiſh general, was the information he afterwards received from deſerters, that the enemy had rallied, and were reenforced behind Cape-Rouge, under the command of M. de Levy, arrived from Montreal for that purpoſe, with two regular battalions; and that M. de Bougainvilie, at the head of 800 men with a convoy of proviſions, was actually on his march to throw himſelf into the town on the 18th, that very morning on which it was ſurrendered. The place was not then completely inveſted, as the enemy had broke their bridge of boats, and poſted detachments in very ſtrong works on the other ſide of the river St. Charles. The capitulation was no ſooner ratified than the Britiſh forces took poſſeſſion of Quebeck on the land ſide, and guards were poſted in different parts of the town to preſerve order and diſcipline: at the ſame time, captain Palliſer, with a body of ſeamen, entered the lower town and took the ſame precautions. Next day about 1000 priſoners were embarked on board tranſports, which proceeded to France with the firſt opportunity. Mean while, the inhabitants of the country came in great numbers, to deliver up their arms, and take the oath of fidelity to the Engliſh government. The death of Montcalm, which was indeed an irreparable loſs to France, in all probability, overwhelmed the enemy with conſternation, and confounded all their councils; otherwiſe we cannot account for the tame ſurrender of Quebeck to a handful of troops, even after the victory they had obtained: for although the place was not regularly fortified on the land-ſide, and moſt of the houſes were in ruins, their walls and parapets had not yet ſuſtained the leaſt damage: the beſiegers were hardly ſufficient to complete the inveſtiture: a freſh army was aſſembled in the neighbourhood, with which their communication continued open: the ſeaſon was ſo far advanced, that the Britiſh forces in a little time muſt have been forced to deſiſt by the ſeverity of the weather, and even retire with their fleet before the approach of winter, which never fails to freeze up the river St. Laurence.

Immediately after the action at the falls of Montmorenci, general Wolfe had diſpatched an officer to England, with a detail of that diſaſter, written with ſuch elegance and accuracy, as would not have diſgraced the pen of a Cæſar. Though the public acquieſced in his conduct, they were exceedingly mortified at his miſcarriage; and this mortification was the greater, as he ſeemed to deſpair of being able to ſtrike any other ſtroke of importance for the accompliſhment of their hope, which had aſpired at the abſolute conqueſt of Canada. The firſt tranſports of their chagrin were not yet ſubſided, when colonel Hale arrived in the ſhip Alcide, with an account of the victory and ſurrender of Quebeck; which was immediately communicated to the people in an extraorninary gazette. The joy which this excited among the populace roſe in proportion to the deſpondence which the former had produced: all was rapture and riot; all was triumph and and exultation, mingled with the praiſe of the all accompliſhed Wolfe, which they exalted even to a rediculous degree of hyperbole. The king expreſſed his ſatisfaction, by conferring the honour of knighthood upon captain Douglas, whoſe ſhip brought the firſt tidings of this ſucceſs; and gratified him and colonel Hale with conſiderable preſents. A day of ſolemn thankſgiving was appointed by proclamation through all the dominions of Great-Britain. The city of London, the univerſities, and many other corporations of the kingdom, preſented congratulatory addreſſes to his majeſty. The parliament was no ſooner aſſembled, than the ſecretary of ſtate, in the houſe of commons, expatiated upon the ſucceſſes of the campaign, the tranſcendant merit of the deceaſed general, the conduct and courage of the admirals and officers who aſſiſted in the conqueſt of Quebeck. In conſequence of this harangue, and the motion by which it was ſucceeded, the houſe unanimouſly reſolved to preſent an addreſs, deſiring his majeſty would order a monument to be erected in Weſtminſter-Abbey to the memory of major-general Wolfe: at the ſame time they paſſed another reſolution, that the thanks of the houſe ſhould be given to the ſurviving generals and admirals employed in the glorious and ſucceſsful expedition to Quebeck. Teſtimonies of this kind, while they reflect honour upon the character of the nation, never fail to animate individuals to a ſpirited exertion of their talents in the ſervice of the public. The people of England were ſo elivated by the aſtoniſhing ſucceſs of this campaign, which was alſo proſperous on the continent of Europe, that far from expreſſing the leaſt ſenſe of the enormous burthens which they bore, they, with a ſpirit peculiar to the Britiſh nation, voluntarily raiſed large contributions, to purchaſe warm jackets, ſtockings, ſhoes, coats, and blankets, for the ſoldiers who were expoſed to the rigours of an inclement ſky in Germany and America. But they diſplayed a more noble proof of unreſtrained benevolence extented even to foes. The French miniſtry, ſtraitened in their finances, which were found ſcarce ſufficient to maintain the war, had ſacrificed their duty to their king, and every ſentiment of compaſſion for his unhappy ſubjects, to a thirſt of vengeance, and ſanguinary views of ambition. They had withdrawn the uſual allowance from their ſubjects who were detained priſoners in England; and thoſe wretched creatures, amounting in number to near 20,000, were left to the mercy of thoſe enemies whom their ſovereign had taken ſuch pains to exaſperate. The allowance with which they were indulged by the Britiſh government effectually ſecured them from the horrors of famine; but ſtill they remained deſtitute of other conveniences, and particularly expoſed to the miſeries of cold and nakedneſs. The generous Engliſh beheld theſe forlorn captives with ſentiments of ſympathy and compaſſion: they conſidered them as their fellow-creatures and brethren in humanity, and forgot their country while they beheld their diſtreſs. A conſiderable ſubſcription was raiſed on their behalf; and in a few weeks they were completely clothed by the charity of their Britiſh benefactors. The beneficient exertion was certainly one of the nobleſt triumphs of the human mind, which even the moſt inveterate enemies of Great-Britain cannot but regard with reverence and admiration. The city of Quebeck being reduced, together with great part of the circumjacent country, brigadier Townſhend, who had accepted his commiſſion with the expreſs proviſo that he ſhould return to England at the end of the campaign, left a garriſon of 5000 effective men, victualled from the fleet, under the command of brigadier Murray; and embarking with admiral Saunders, arrived in Great-Britain about the beginning of winter. As for brigadier Monckton, he was conveyed to New-York, where he happily recovered of his wound.

While the arms of Great-Britain triumphed in Europe and America, her intereſt was not ſuffered to languiſh in other parts of the world. This was the ſeaſon of ambition and activity, in which every ſeparate armament, every diſtinct corps, and every individual officer, ſeemed to exert themſelves with the moſt eager appetite of glory. The Eaſt-Indies, which, in the courſe of the preceding year, had been the theatre of operations carried on with various ſucceſs, exhibited nothing now but a ſucceſſion of trophies to the Engliſh commanders. The Indian tranſactions of the laſt year we interrupted at that period when the French general, Lally, was employed in making preparations for the ſiege of Madras. In the month of October he had marched into Arcot without oppoſition; and in the beginning of December, he advanced towards Madras. On the 12th he marched over Choultry plain, in three diviſions, cannonaded by the Engliſh artillery with conſiderable effect, and took poſt at Egmore and St. Thome. Colonel Laurence, who commanded the garriſon of Madras, retired to the iſland, in order to prevent the enemy from taking poſſeſſion of the iſland bridge, and at the ſame time ordered the poſts to be occupied in the Black-town or ſuburbs of Madras. In the morning of the 14th, the enemy marched with their whole force to attac this place, the Engliſh detachments retreated into the garriſon, and within the hour a grand ſally was made, under the command of colonel Draper, a gallant officer, who ſignalized himſelf remarkably on this occaſion. He attacked the regiment of Lorraine with great impetuoſity; and, in all probability, would have beat them off, had they not been ſuſtained by the arrival of a freſh brigade. After a warm diſpute, in which many officers, and a great number of men, were killed on each ſide, colonel Draper was obliged to retreat, not altogether ſatisfied with the conduct of his grenadiers. As the garriſon of Madras was not very numerous, nothing further was attempted on their ſide without the works. In the mean time, the enemy uſed all their diligence in erecting batteries againſt the fort and town, which being opened on the 6th day of January, they maintained a continual diſcharge of ſhot and ſhells for 20 days, advancing their trenches all the time under cover of this fire, until they reached the breaſt of the glacis. There they erected a battery of four pieces of cannon, and opened it on the laſt day of the month; but for five days ſucceſſively they were obliged to cloſe their embraſures, by the ſuperior fire of the fort, and at length to abandon it entirely: nevertheleſs, they ſtill maintained a ſevere fire from the firſt grand battery, which was placed at the diſtance of 450 yards from the defences. This artillery was ſo well ſerved, as to diſable 26 pieces of cannon, three mortars, and effect an inconſiderable breach. Perhaps they might have had more ſucceſs, had they battered in breach from the beginning; but mr. Lally, in order to intimidate the inhabitants, had cruelly bombarded the town, and demoliſhed the houſes: he was, however, happily diſappointed in his expectation by the wiſe and reſolute precautions of governor Pigot; by the vigilance, conduct, and bravery of the colonels Laurence and Draper, ſeconded by the valour and activity of major Brereton, and the ſpirit of the inferior officers. The artillery of the garriſon was ſo well managed, that, from the 5th day of February, the fire of the enemy gradually decreaſed from 23 to ſix pieces of cannon; nevertheleſs, they advanced their ſap along the ſea-ſide, ſo as to embrace entirely the north-eaſt angle of the covered way, from whence their muſquetry drove the beſieged. They likewiſe endeavoured to open a paſſage into the ditch by a mine, but ſprung it ſo injudiciouſly, that they could make no advantage of it, as it lay expoſed to the fire of ſeveral cannon. While theſe preparations were carried on before the town, major Caillaud and captain Preſton, with a body of ſepoys, ſome of the country horſe, and a few Europeans, drawn from the Engliſh garriſons of Trichenapally, and Chingalaput, hovered at the diſtance of a few miles, blocking up the roads in ſuch a manner, that the enemy were obliged, four ſeveral times, to ſend large detachments againſt them, in order to open the communication: thus the progreſs of the ſiege was in a great meaſure retarded. On the 16th day of February in the evening, the Queenborough ſhip of war, commanded by captain Kempenfeldt, and the company's ſhip the Revenge, arrived in the road of Madras, with a re-enforcement of 600 men belonging to colonel Draper's regiment, and part of them was immediately diſembarked. From the beginning of the ſiege, the enemy had diſcovered a backwardneſs in the ſervice very unſuitable to their national character. They were ill ſupplied by their commiſſaries and contractors: they were diſcouraged by the obſtinate defence of the garriſon, and all their hope of ſucceſs vaniſhed at the arrival of this re-enforcement. After a briſk fire, they raiſed the ſiege that very night, abandoning 40 pieces of cannon; and, having deſtroyed the powder-mills at Ogmore, retreated to the territory of Arcot. [u]

M. Lally having weakened his forces that were at Ma-

[u] The chagrin and mortification of Lally are ſtrongly marked in the following intercepted letter to M. de Legret, dated from the camp before Madras:

'A good blow might be ſtruc here; there is a ſhip in the road, of 20 guns, laden with all the riches of Madras, which it is ſaid will remain there till the 20th. The Expedition is juſt arrived, but M. Gerlin is not a man to attac her; for ſhe has made him run away once before. The Briſtol, on the other hand, did but juſt make her appearance before St. Thomas: and on the vague report of 13 ſhips coming from Porto-Novo, ſhe took fright: and after landing the proviſions with which ſhe was laden, ſhe would not ſtay long enough even to take on board 12 of her own guns, which ſhe had lent us for the ſiege.

'If I was the judge of the point of honour of the company's officers, I would break him like glaſs, as well as ſome others of them.

'The Fidelle, or the Harlem, or even the aforeſaid Briſtol, with the 12 guns reſtored to her, would be ſufficient to make themſelves maſters of the Engliſh ſhip, if they could manage ſo as to get to windward of her in the night. Maugendre and Tremillier are ſaid to be good men, and were they employed only to tranſport 200 wounded men that we have here, their ſervice would be of importance.

'We remain ſtill in the ſame poſition: the breach made theſe 15 days; all the time within 15 toiſes of the wall of the place, and never holding up our heads to look at it.

'I reckon we ſhall, on our arrival at Pondicherry, endeavour to learn ſome other trade, for this of war requires too much patience.

'Of 1500 ſepoys which attended our army, I reckon near 800 are employed upon the road to Pondicherry, laden with ſugar, pepper, and other goods; and as for the Coulis, they are employed for the ſame purpoſe, from the firſt day we came here.

'I am taking my meaſures from this day to ſet fire to the Black-town, and to blow up the powder-mills.

'You will never imagine that 50 French deſerters, and 100 Swiſs, are actually ſtopping the progreſs of 2000 men of the king's and company's troops, which are ſtill here exiſting, notwithſtanding the exaggerated accounts ſulipatam, under the conduct of the marquis de Conflans, in order to ſtrengthen the army with which he undertook the ſiege of Madras, the rajah of Viſanapore drove the French garriſon from Vizagapatam, and hoiſted Engliſh colours in the place. The marquis having put his troops in motion to revenge this inſult, the rajah ſollicited ſuccour from colonel Clive at Calcutta; and, with the conſent of the council, a body of troops was ſent, under the command of colonel Forde, to his aſſiſtance. They conſiſted of 500 Europeans, including a company of artillery, and 1600 ſepoys, with about 15 pieces of cannon, one howitzer, and three mortars. The forces of Conflans were much more conſiderable. On the 20th day of October, colonel Forde arrived at Vizagapatam, and made an agreement with the rajah, who promiſed to pay the expence of the expedition, as ſoon as he ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of Rajamundry, a large town and fort poſſeſſed by the French. It was ſtipulated that he ſhould have all the inland country belonging to the Indian powers in the French intereſt, and at preſent in arms; and that the Engliſh company ſhould retain all the conquered ſea-coaſt from Vizagapatam to Maſulipatam. On the 1ſt of November colonel Forde proceeded on his march, and on the 3d joined the rajah's army, conſiſting of between 3 and 4000 men. On the 3d day of December they came in ſight of the enemy, near the village of Tallapool: but the French declining battle, the colonel determined to draw them from their advantageous ſituation, or march round, and get between them and Rajamundry. On the 7th, before day-break, he began his march, leaving the rajah's forces on their ground; but the enemy beginning to cannonade the Indian forces, he, at the requeſt of the rajah, returned, and took them under his protection. Then they marched together to the village of Golapool, and halted on a ſmall plain about three miles from their encampment. About nine he formed the line of battle. About ten the enemy were drawn up, and began the cannonade. The firing on both ſides having continued about 40 minutes, the enemy's line advanced to the charge with great reſolution, and were ſo warmly received, that after ſeveral ſpirited efforts, at eleven they gave way, and retreated in diſorder towards Rajamundry. During this conflict, the rajah's forces ſtood as idle ſpectators; nor could their horſe be prevailed upon to purſue the fugitives. This victory coſt the Engliſh 44 Europeans killed and wounded, including two captains and three lieutenants. The French loſt above three times the number, together with their whole camp, baggage, 32 pieces of cannon, and all their ammunition. A great number of blac forces fell on both ſides. The marquis de Conflans did not remain at Rajamundry, but proceeded to Maſulipatam; while captain Knox, with a detachment from the Engliſh army, took poſſeſſion of the fort of Rajamundry, which is the barrier and key to the country of Vizagapatam. This was delivered to the rajah on his paying the expence of the expedition; and captain Knox being detached with a battalion of ſepoys, took poſſeſſion of the French factory at Narſipore. This was alſo the fate of a ſmall fort at Coucate, which ſurrendered to captain Maclean, after having made an obſtinate defence. In the mean time, however, the French army of obſervation made ſhift to re-take Rajamundry, where they found a conſiderable quantity of money, baggage, and effects belonging to Engliſh officers.

Colonel Forde advancing to the neighbourhood of Maſulipatam, the marquis de Conflans with his forces retired within the place, which on the 7th day of March was inveſted. By the 7th day of April the ammunition of the beſiegers being almoſt expended, colonel Forde, determined to give the aſſault, as two breaches were already made, and made his diſpoſition accordingly. The attac was begun in the night, and the aſſailants arrived at the ditch before they were diſcovered. But here they underwent a terrible diſcharge of grape-ſhot and muſquetry; notwithſtanding which they entered the breaches, and drove the enemy from baſtion to baſtion. At length, the marquis de Conflans ſent an officer to demand quarter for the garriſon, which was granted as ſoon as he ordered his men to ceaſe firing. Thus, with about 340 European ſoldiers, a handful of ſeamen, and 700 ſepoys colonel Forde took by aſſault the ſtrong town of Maſulipatam, garriſoned by 522 Europeans, 2039 caffrees, topaſſes, and ſepoys; and here he found above 150 pieces of cannon, with a great quantity of ammunition. Salabatzing, the ſubah of Decan, perceiving the ſucceſs of the Engliſh here as well as at Madras, being ſic of his French alliance, and in dread of his brother Nizam Allee, who had ſet up a ſeparate intereſt, and taken the field againſt him, made advances to the company, with which he forthwith concluded a treaty to the following effect:—'The whole of the circar of Maſulipatam ſhall be given to the Engliſh company. Salabatzing will not ſuffer the French to have a ſettlement in this country, nor keep them in his ſervice, nor give them any aſſiſtance. The Engliſh, on their part, will not aſſiſt, nor give protection to the ſubah's enemies.' In a few days after Maſulipatam was reduced, two ſhips arrived in the road, with a re-enforcement of 400 men to the marquis de Conflans; but underſtanding the fate of the place, made the beſt of their way to Ganjam.

The merchants reſiding at Surat, finding themſelves expoſed to numberleſs dangers, and every ſpecies of oppreſſion, by the ſidee who commanded the caſtle, on one hand, by the governor of the city on the other, and by the Mahrattas, who had claimed to a certain ſhare of the revenue, made application to the Engliſh preſidency at Bombay, deſiring they would equip an expedition for taking poſſeſſion of the caſtle and Tanka, and ſettle the government of the city upon Pharaſs Cawn, who had been naib or deputy-governor under Meah Atchund, and regulated the police to the ſatisfaction of the inhabitants. The preſidency embraced the propoſal: admiral Pococke ſpared 2 of his ſhips for this ſervice. Eight hundred and fifty men, artillery and infantry, with 1500 ſepoys, under the command of captain Richard Maitland, of the royal regiment of artillery, were embarked on board the company's armed veſſels commanded by captain Watſon, who ſailed on the 9th day of February. On the 15th, they were landed at a place called Dentiloury, about nine miles from Surat; and here they were encamped for refreſhment: in two days he advanced againſt the French garden, in which a conſiderable number of the ſidee's men were poſted, and drove them from thence, after a very obſtinate diſpute. Then he erected a battery, from which he battered the wall in breach: but this method appearing tedious, he called a council of war, compoſed of the land and ſea-officers, and laid before them the plan of a general attac, which was accordingly executed next morning. The company's grab, and the bomb-ketches, being warped up the river in the night, were ranged in a line of battle oppoſite to the Bundar, which was the ſtrongeſt fortification that the enemy poſſeſſed, and under the fire of theſe, the troops being landed, took the Bundar by aſſault. The outward town being thus gained, he forthwith began to bombard the inner town and caſtle with ſuch fury, that next morning they both ſurrendered, on condition of being allowed to march out with their effects; and captain Maitland took poſſeſſion without further diſpute. Meah Atchund was continued governor of Surat, and Pharas Cawn was appointed naib. The artillery and ammunition found in the caſtle were ſecured for the company, until the mogul's pleaſure was known; and in a little time a phirmaud, or grant, arrived from Delhi, appointing the Engliſh company admiral to the mogul; ſo that the ſhips and ſtores belonged to them of courſe, as part of the Tanka; and they were now declared legal poſſeſſors of the caſtle. This conqueſt, which coſt about 200 men, including a few officers, was achieved with ſuch expedition, that captain Watſon returned to Bombay by the 9th day of April.

The main body of the Engliſh forces, which had been centered at Madras, for the preſervation of that important ſettlement, took the field after the ſiege was raiſed, and poſſeſſed themſelves of Conjeveram, a place of great conſequence, which, with the fort of Schengelpel, commanded all the adjacent country, and ſecured the Britiſh poſſeſſions to the northward. M. Lally, ſenſible of the importance of the poſt, took the ſame rout, in order to diſlodge them; but that every one makes here, according to his own fancy, of the ſlaughter that has been made of them; and you will ſtill be more ſurpriſed, if I tell you, that, were it not for the combats and four battles we ſuſtained, and for the batteries which failed, or, to ſpeak more properly, which were unſkilfully made, we ſhould not have loſt 50 men, from the commencement of the ſiege to this day. I have written to M. de Larche, that if he perſiſts in not coming here, let who will raiſe money upon the Poleagers for me, I will not do it; and I will renounce (as I informed you a month ago I would do) meddling directly or indirectly with any thing whatever that may have relation to your adminiſtration, whether civil or military. For I had rather go and command the caffres of Madagaſcar than remain in this Sodom; which it is impoſſible but the fire of the Engliſh muſt deſtroy ſooner or later, even though that from Heaven ſhould not.

'I have the honour to be, &c. &c.

'Signed, LALLY.

'P. S.—I think it neceſſary to appriſe you, that, as M. de Soupire has refuſed to take upon him the command of this army, which I have offered him, and which he is empowered to accept, by having received from the court a duplicate of my commiſſion, you muſt of neceſſity, together with the council, take it upon you. For my part, I undertake only to bring it back either to Arcotte or Sadraſte. Send, therefore, your orders, or come yourſelves to command it; for I ſhall quit it upon my arrival there.'

finding all his attempts ineffectual, he retired to Wandewaſh, where his troops were put into quarters of cantonment. No other operations enſued to the month of September, when major Brereton, who commanded the Engliſh forces, being joined by major Gordon with 300 men of colonel Coote's battalion, reſolved to attac the enemy in his turn. On the 14th day of the month he began his march from Conjeveram for Wandewaſh, at the head 400 Europeans, 7000 ſepoys, 70 European and 300 black horſe, with 14 pieces of artillery. In his march he inveſted and took the fort of Trivitar, from whence he proceeded to the village of Wandewaſh, where the French, to the number of 1000, were ſtrongly encamped under the guns of a fort commanded by a rajah, mounting 20 cannon, under the direction of a French gunner. On the 30th day of September, at two in the morning, the Engliſh attacked the village in three different places, and drove them from it after a very obſtinate diſpute; but this advantage they were not able to maintain. The blac pioneers ran away during the attac, ſo that proper traverſes could not be made in the ſtreets; and at day-break the fort poured in upon them a prodigious diſcharge of grape-ſhot with a conſiderable effect. The enemy had retired to a dry ditch, which ſerved as an entrenchment, from whence they made furious ſallies; and a body of 300 European horſe were already in motion, to fall upon and complete their confuſion. In this emergency, they retired in diſorder, and might have been entirely ruined, had not a body of reſerve effectually covered their retreat; yet this could not be effected without the loſs of ſeveral officers, and above 300 men killed and wounded. After this mortifying chec, they encamped a few days in ſight of the fort, and the rainy ſeaſon ſetting in, returned to Conjeveram. The fort of Wandewaſh was afterwards garriſoned by French and ſepoys, and the other forces of the enemy were aſſembled by brigadier-general de Buſſy at Arcot.

During theſe tranſactions by land, the ſuperiority by ſea was ſtill diſputed between the Engliſh and French admirals. On the 1ſt day of September, vice-admiral Pococke ſailed from Madras to the ſouthward, in queſt of the enemy; and next day deſcried the French fleet, conſiſting of 15 ſail, ſtanding to the northward. He forthwith threw out the ſignal for a general chaſe, and ſtood towards them with all the ſail he could carry; but the wind abating, he could not approach near enough to engage. During the three ſucceeding days, he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to bring them to a battle, which they ſtill declined, and at laſt they diſappeared. He then directed his courſe to Pondicherry, on the ſuppoſition that they were bound to that harbour; and on the 8th day of the month perceived them ſtanding to the ſouthward: but he could not bring them to an engagement till the tenth, when M. d'Apché, about two in the afternoon, made the ſignal for battle, and the cannonading began without further delay. The Britiſh ſquadron did not exceed nine ſhips of the line; the enemy's fleet conſiſted of eleven; but they had ſtill a greater advantage in number of men and artillery. Both ſquadrons fought with great impetuoſity till about ten minutes after four, when the enemy's rear began to give way: this example was ſoon followed by their centre; and finally the van, with the whole ſquadron, bore to the ſouth-ſouth-eaſt, with all the canvas they could ſpread. The Britiſh ſquadron was ſo much damaged in their maſts and rigging, that they could not purſue; ſo that M. d'Apché retreated at his leiſure unmoleſted. On the 15th, admiral Pococke returned to Madras, where his ſquadron being repaired by the 26th, he ſailed again to Pondicherry, and in the road ſaw the enemy lying at anchor in line of battle. The wind being off ſhore, he made the line of battle a-head, and for ſome time continued in this ſituation. At length the French admiral weighed anchor, and came forth; but inſtead of bearing down upon the Engliſh ſquadron, which had fallen to leeward, he kept cloſe to the wind, and ſtretched away to the ſouthward. Admiral Pococke finding him averſe to another engagement, and his own ſquadron being in no condition to purſue, he, with the advice of his captains, deſiſted and meaſured bac his courſe to Madras. On the ſide of the Engliſh, above 300 men were killed in the engagement, including captain Miche, who commanded the Newcaſtle, captain Gore of the marines, two lieutenants, a maſter, gunner and boatſwain: the captains Somerſet and Brereton, with about 250 men were wounded, and many of the ſhips conſiderably damaged. The loſs of the enemy muſt have been much more conſiderable; becauſe the Engliſh in battle always fire at the body of the ſhip; becauſe the French ſquadron was crowded with men; becauſe they gave way, and declined a ſecond engagement; and finally, becauſe they now made the beſt of their way to the iſland of Mauritius, in order to be refitted, having on board general Lally, and ſome other officers. Thus they left the Engliſh maſters of the Indian coaſt; a ſuperiority ſtill more confirmed by the arrival of rear-admiral Corniſh, with four ſhips of the line, who had ſet ſail from England in the beginning of the year, and joined admiral Pococke at Madras on the 18th of October.

The French were not the only enemies with whom the Engliſh had to cope in the Eaſt-Indies. The great extention of their trade in the kingdom of Bengal had excited the envy and avarice of the Dutch factory, who poſſeſſed a ſtrong fort at Chinchura, on the river of Bengal; and reſolved, if poſſible, to engroſs the whole ſalt-peter branch of commerce. They had, without doubt, tampered with the new ſubah, who lay under ſuch obligations to the Engliſh, and probably ſecured his connivance. Their ſcheme was approved by the governor of Batavia, who charged himſelf with the execution of it; and, for that purpoſe choſe the opportunity when the Britiſh ſquadron had retired to the coaſt of Malabar. On pretence of re-enforcing the Dutch garriſons in Bengal, he equipped an armament of ſeven ſhips, having on board 500 European troops, and 600 Malayeſe, under the command of colonel Ruſſel. This armament having touched at Negapatam, proceeded up the bay, and arrived in the river of Bengal about the beginning of October. Colonel Clive, who then reſided at Calcutta, had received information of their deſign, which he was reſolved, at all events, to defeat. He complained to the ſubah, who, upon ſuch application, could not decently refuſe an order to the director and council of Hughley, implying, that this armament ſhould not proceed up the river. The colonel, at the ſame time, ſent a letter to the Dutch commodore, intimating, that as he had received intimation of their deſign, he could not allow them to land forces, and march to Chinchura. In anſwer to this declaration, the Dutch commodore, whoſe whole fleet had not yet arrived, aſſured the Engliſh commander that he had no intention to ſend any forces to Chinchura; and begged liberty to land ſome of his troops for refreſhment; a favour that was granted, on condition that they ſhould not advance. Notwithſtanding the ſubah's order, and his own engagement to this effect, the reſt of the ſhips were no ſooner arrived, than he proceeded up the river to the neighbourhood of Tannah-fort, where his forces being diſembarked, began their march to Chinchura. In the mean time, by way of retaliating the affront he pretended of having ſuſtained, in being denied a paſſage to their own factory, he took ſeveral ſmall veſſels on the river belonging to the Engliſh company; and the Calcutta Indiaman, commanded by captain Wilſon, homeward bound, ſailing down the river, the Dutchman gave him to underſtand, that if he preſumed to paſs he would ſink him without further ceremony. The Engliſh captain ſeeing them run out their guns, as if he really reſolved to put their threats in execution, returned to Calcutta, where the two other India ſhips lay at anchor, and reported the adventure to colonel Clive, who forthwith ordered the three ſhips to prepare for battle, and attac the Dutch armament. The ſhips being properly manned, and their quarters lined with ſalt-peter, they fell down the river, and found the Dutch ſquadron drawn up in the line of battle, in order to give them a warm reception, for which they ſeemed well prepared; for three of them were mounted with 36 guns each: three of them with 26, and the ſeventh carried 16. The Duke of Dorſet, commanded by captain Forreſter, being the firſt that approached them, dropped anchor cloſe to their line, and began the engagement with a broadſide which was immediately returned. A dead calm unfortunately intervening, this ſingle ſhip was for a conſiderable time expoſed to the whole fire of the enemy; but a ſmall breeze ſpringing up, the Calcutta and the Hardwicke advanced to her aſſiſtance, and a ſevere fire was maintained on both ſides, till two of the Dutch ſhips ſlipping their cables, bore away, and a third was driven a ſhore. Their commodore thus weakened, after a few broadſides ſtruc his flag to captain Wilſon, and the other three followed his example. The victory being thus obtained, without the loſs of one man on the ſide of the Engliſh, captain Wilſon took poſſeſſion of the prizes, the decs of which were ſtrewed with carnage, and ſent the priſoners to colonel Clive, at Calcutta. The detachment of troops which they had landed, to the number of 1100 men, was not more fortunate in their progreſs. Colonel Clive no ſooner received intelligence that they were in full march to Chinchura than he detached colonel Forde with 500 men, from Calcutta, in order to oppoſe, and put a ſtop to their march at the French gardens. He accordingly advanced to the northward, and entered the town of Chandernagore, where he ſuſtained the fire of a Dutch party ſent out from Chinchura to join and conduct the expected re-enforcement. Theſe being routed and diſperſed, after a ſhort action, colonel Forde in the morning proceeded to a plain in the neighbourhood of Chinchura, where he found the enemy prepared to give him battle, on the 25th day of November. They even advanced to the charge with great reſolution and activity; but found the fire of the Engliſh artillery and battalion ſo intolerably hot, that they ſoon gave way, and were totally defeated. A conſiderable number were killed, and the greater part of thoſe who ſurvived the action were taken priſoners. During this conteſt, the nabob, at the head of a conſiderable army, obſerved a ſuſpicious neutrality; and in all likelihood would have declared for the Dutch, had they proved victorious, as he had reaſon to believe they would, from their great ſuperiority in number. But fortune no ſooner determined in favour of the Engliſh than he made a tender of his ſervice to the victor, and even offered to reduce Chincura with his own army. In the mean time, propoſals of accommodation being ſent to him by the directors and council of the Dutch factory at Chinchura, a negotiation enſued, and a treaty was concluded to the ſatisfaction of all parties. Above 300 of the priſoners entered into the ſervice of Great-Britain; the reſt embarked on board their ſhips, which were reſtored ſoon as the peace was ratified, and ſet out on their return for Batavia. After all, perhaps, the Dutch company meant nothing more than to put their factory of Chinchura on a more reſpectable footing; and, by acquiring greater weight and conſequence among the people of the country than they formerly poſſeſſed, the more eaſily extend their commerce in that part of the world. At any rate, it will admit of a diſpute among thoſe who profeſs the law of nature and nations, whether the Dutch company could be juſtly debarred the privilege of ſending a re-enforcement to their own garriſons. Be that as it will, the ſhips were not reſtored until the factory at Chinchura had given ſecurity to indemnify the Engliſh for the damage they had ſuſtained on this occaſion.

The ſucceſs of the Engliſh company was ſtill more conſpicuous on the coaſt of Coromandel. The governor and council of Madras having received information, that the French general Lally had ſent a detachment of his army to the ſouthward, taken Syringham, and threatened Trichenapally with a ſiege, it was determined that colonel Coote, who had lately arrived from England, ſhould take the field, and endeavour to make a diverſion to the ſouthward. He accordingly began his march at the head of 1700 Europeans, including cavalry, and 3000 blacks, with 14 pieces of cannon and one howitzer. On the 27th day of November he inveſted the fort of Wandewaſh: having made a practicable breach, the garriſon, conſiſting of near 900 men, ſurrendered priſoners of war; and he found in the place 49 pieces of cannon, with a great quantity of ammunition. Then he undertook the ſiege of Carangoly, a fortreſs commanded by colonel O'Kennely, at the head of 100 Europeans, and 500 ſepoys. In a few days he diſmounted the greater part of their guns; and they ſubmitted, on condition that the Europeans ſhould be allowed to march out with the honours of war, but the ſepoys were diſarmed and diſmiſſed.

General Lally, alarmed at the progreſs of this brave, vigilant, and enterprizing officer, aſſembled all his forces at Arcot, to the number of 2200 Europeans, including horſe, 300 caffres, and 10,000 blac troops, or ſepoys, with 25 pieces of cannon. Of theſe he aſſumed the command in perſon; and on the 10th day of January began his march, in order to recover Wandewaſh. Colonel Coote, having received intelligence on the 12th that he had taken poſſeſſion of Conjeveram, endeavoured by a forced march to ſave the place, which they accordingly abandoned at his approach, and purſuing their march to Wandewaſh, inveſted the fort without delay. The Engliſh commander paſſed the river Palla, in order to follow the ſame rout; and, on the 21ſt day of the month, underſtanding that a breach was already made, reſolved to give them battle without further delay. The cavalry being formed, and ſupported by five companies of ſepoys, he advanced againſt the enemy's horſe, which, being at the ſame time galled by two pieces of cannon, retired with precipitation. Then colonel Coote, having taken poſſeſſion of a tank which they had occupied, returned to the line, which was by this time formed in order of battle. Seeing the men in high ſpirits, and eager to engage, he ordered the whole army to advance, and by nine in the morning they were within two miles of the enemy's camp, where they had halted about half an hour. During this interval, the colonel reconnoitred the ſituation of the French forces, who were very advantageouſly poſted, and made a movement to the right, which obliged them to alter their diſpoſition. They now advanced, in their turn, within three quarters of a mile of the Engliſh line, and the cannonading began with great fury on both ſides. About noon their European cavalry coming up with a reſolute air to charge the left of the Engliſh, colonel Coote brought up ſome companies of ſepoys, and two pieces of cannon to ſuſtain the horſe, which were ordered to oppoſe them, and theſe advancing on their flank, diſturbed them ſo much, that they broke, and were driven by the Engliſh cavalry above a mile from the left, upon the rear of their own army. Mean while, both lines continued advancing to each other, and about one o'clock the firing with ſmall arms began with great vivacity. One of the French tumbrils being blown up by an accidental ſhot, the Engliſh commander took immediate advantage of their confuſion. He orderd major Brereton to wheel Draper's regiment to the left, and fall upon the enemy's flank. This ſervice was performed with ſuch reſolution and ſucceſs, that the left wing of the French was completely routed, and fell upon their centre, now cloſely engaged with the left of the Engliſh. About two in the afternoon their whole line gave way, and fled towards their own camp, which, perceived themſelves cloſely purſued, they precipitately abandoned, together with 22 pieces of cannon. In this engagement they loſt about 800 men killed and wounded, beſides about 50 priſoners, including brigadier-general de Buſſy, the chevalier Godeville, quarter-maſter-general, lieutenant-colonel Murphy, three captains, five lieutenants, and ſome other officers. On the ſide of the Engliſh 262 were killed or wounded, and among the former the gallant and accompliſhed major Brereton, whoſe death was a real loſs to his country.

General Lally having retreated with his broken troops to Pondicherry, the baron de Vaſſerot was detached towards the ſame place, with 1000 horſe and 300 ſepoys, to ravage and lay waſte the French territory. In the mean time, the indefatigable colonel Coote undertook the ſiege of Chilliput, which in two days was ſurrendered by the chevalier de Tilly, himſelf, and his garriſon remaining priſoners of war. Such alſo was the fate of fort Timmery, which being reduced, the colonel proſecuted his march to Arcot, the capital of the province, againſt the fort of which he opened his batteries on the 5th day of February. When he had carried on his approaches within 60 yards of the creſt of the glacis, the garriſon, conſiſting of 250 Europeans, and near 300 ſepoys, ſurrendered as priſoners of war, and here the Engliſh commander found 22 pieces of cannon, four mortars, and a great quantity of all kinds of military ſtores. Thus the campaign was glorioufly finiſhed with the conqueſt of Arcot, after the French army had been routed and ruined by the diligence of colonel Coote, whoſe courage, conduct, and activity cannot be ſufficiently admired. The reader will perceive, that, rather than interrupt the thread of ſuch an intereſting narration, we have ventured to encroach upon the annals of the year 1760.

Having thus followed the Britiſh banners through the glorious tracts they purſued in different parts of Aſia and America, we muſt now convert our attention to the continent of Europe, where the Engliſh arms, in the courſe of this vere, triumphed with equal luſtre and advantage. But firſt it may be neceſſary to ſketch out the ſituations in which the belligerent powers were found at the cloſe of winter. The viciſſitudes of fortune with which the preceding campaign had been checquered were ſufficient to convince every potentate concerned in the war, that neither ſide poſſeſſed ſuch a ſuperiority in ſtrength or conduct as was requiſite to impoſe terms upon the other. Battles had been fought with various ſucceſs; and ſurpriſing efforts of military ſkill had been exhibited, without producing one event which tended to promote a general peace, or even engender the leaſt deſire of accommodation; on the contrary, the firſt and moſt violent tranſports of animoſity had by this time ſubſided into a confirmed habit of deliberate hatred, and every contending power ſeemed more than ever determined to protract the diſpute, while the neutral ſtates kept aloof, without expreſſing the leaſt deſire of interpoſing their mediation. Some of them were reſtrained by conſiderations of conveniency; and others waited in ſuſpence for the death of the Spaniſh monarch, as an event which they imagined would be attended with very important conſequences in the ſouthern parts of Europe. With reſpect to the maintenance of the war, whatever difficulties might have ariſen in ſettling funds to ſupport the expence, and finding men to recruit the different armies, certain it is all theſe difficulties were ſurmounted before the opening of the campaign. The court of Vienna, though hampered by the narrowneſs of its finances, ſtill found reſources in the fertility of its provinces, in the number and attachment of its ſubjects, who, more than any other people in Europe, acquieſce in the diſpoſitions of their ſovereign; and, when pay cannot be afforded, willingly contribute free quarters for the ſubſiſtence of the army. The czarina, though ſhe complained that the ſtipulated ſubſidies were ill paid, nevertheleſs perſiſted in purſuing thoſe favourite aims which had for ſome time influenced her conduct; namely, her perſonal animoſity to the king of Pruſſia, and her deſire of obtaining a permanent intereſt in the German empire. Sweden ſtill made a ſhow of hoſtility againſt the Pruſſian monarch, but continued to ſlumber over the engagements ſhe had contracted. France, exhauſted in her finances, and abridged of her marine commerce, maintained a reſolute countenance, ſupplied freſh armies for her operations in Weſtphalia, projected new ſchemes of conqueſt, and cajoled her allies with fair promiſes, when ſhe had nothing more ſolid to beſtow. The king of Pruſſia's dominions were generally drained, or in the hands of the enemy; but, to balance theſe diſadvantages, he kept poſſeſſion of Saxony, and enjoyed his annual ſubſidy from Great-Britain, which effectually enabled him to maintain his armies on a reſpectable footing, and open the campaign with equal eagerneſs and confidence.

The Hanoverian army, commanded by prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, was ſtrengthened by freſh re-enforcements from England, augmented with German recruits, regularly paid, and well ſupplied with every comfort and convenience which foreſight could ſuggeſt, or money procure; yet, in ſpite of all the precautions that could be taken, they were cut off from ſome reſources which the French, in the beginning of the year, opened to themſelves by a flagrant ſtroke of perfidy, which even the extreme neceſſities of a campaign can hardly excuſe. On the 2d day of January, the French regiment of Naſſau preſented itſelf before the gates of Frankfort on the Maine a neutral imperial city, and demanding a paſſage, it was introduced, and conducted by a detachment of the garriſon through the city, as far as the gate of Saxen-hauſen, where it unexpectedly halted, and immediately diſarmed the guards. Before the inhabitants could recover from the conſternation into which they were thrown by this outrageous inſult, five other French regiments entered the place, and here their general, the prince de Soubiſe, eſtabliſhed his head-quarters. How deeply ſoever this violation of the laws of the empire might be reſented by all honeſt Germans, who retained affection for the conſtitutions of their country, it was a ſtep from which the French army derived a very manifeſt and important advantage; for it ſecured to them the courſe of the Maine and the Upper-Rhine; by which they received, without difficulty or danger, every ſpecies of ſupply from Mentz, Spire, Worms, and even the country of Alſace; while it maintained their communication with the chain formed by the Auſtrian forces and the army of the empire.

The ſcheme of operations for the enſuing campaign was already formed between the king of Pruſſia and prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick; and before the armies took the field ſeveral ſkirmiſhes were fought, and quarters ſurpriſed. In the latter end of February, the prince of Yſembourg detached major-general Urſt with four battalions and a body of horſe, who, aſſembling in Rotenbourg, ſupriſed the enemy's quarters in the night between the firſt and ſecond day of March, and drove them from Hirchfield, Vacha, and all the Heſſian bailiwicks of which they had taken poſſeſſion; but the Auſtrians ſoon returning in greater numbers, and being ſupported by a detachment of French troops from Franckfort, the allies fell bac in their turn. In a few days, however, they themſelves retreated again with great precipitation, though they did not all eſcape. The hereditary prince of Brunſwick, with a body of Pruſſian huſſars, fell upon them ſuddenly at Molrichſtadt, where he routed and diſperſed a regiment of Hohenzollern cuiraſſiers, and a battalion of the troops of Wurtzburg. He next day, which was the 1ſt of April, advanced with a body of horſe and foot to Meinungen, where he found a conſiderable magazine, took two battalions priſoners, and ſurprized a third poſted at Wafungen, after having defeated ſome Auſtrian troops that were on the march to its relief. While the hereditary prince was thus employed, the duke of Holſtein, with another body of the confederates, diſlodged the French from the poſt of Freyinſtenau.

But the great object was to drive the enemy from Franckfort before they ſhould receive the expected re-enforcements. Prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, being determind upon this enterpriſe, aſſembled all his forces near Fulda, to the amount of 40,000 choice troops, and began his march on the 10th day of April. On the 13th he came in ſight of the enemy, whom he found ſtrongly encamped about the village of Bergen, between Franckfort and Hanau. Their general the Duke de Broglio, counted one of the beſt officers in France with reſpect to conduct and intrepidity, having received intelligence of the prince's deſign, occupied this poſt on the 12th, the right of his army being at Bergen, and his centre and flanks ſecured in ſuch a manner, that the allies could not make their attac any other way but by the village. Notwithſtanding the advantage of their ſituation, prince Ferdinand reſolved to give them battle, and made his diſpoſitions accordingly. About 10 in the morning the grenadiers of the advanced guard began the attac on the village of Bergen with great vivacity, and ſuſtained a moſt terrible fire from eight German battalions, ſupported by ſeveral brigades of the French infantry. The grenadiers of the allied army, though re-enforced by ſeveral battalions under the command of the prince of Yſembourg, far from diſlodging the enemy from the village, were, after a very obſtinate diſpute, obliged to retreat in ſome diſorder, but rallied again behind a body of Heſſian cavalry. The allies being repulſed in three different attacs, their general made a new diſpoſition, and brought up his artillery, with which the village and different parts of the French line were ſeverely cannonaded. They were not ſlow in retorting an equal fire, which continued till night, when the allies retreated to Windeken, with the loſs of five pieces of cannon, and about 2000 men, including the prince of Yſembourg, who fell in the action. The French, by the nature of their ſituation, could not ſuffer much, but they were ſo effectually amuſed by the artful diſpoſition of prince Ferdinand, that, inſtead of taking meaſures to harraſs him in his retreat, they carefully maintained their ſituation, apprehenſive of another general attac. Indeed they had great reaſon to be ſatisfied with the iſſue of this battle, without riſking, in any meaſure, the advantage they had gained. It was their buſineſs to remain quiet, until their re-enforcement ſhould arrive, and this plan they invariably purſued. On the other hand, the allies, in conſequence of their miſcarriage, were reduced to the neceſſity of acting upon the defenſive, and encountering a great number of difficulties and inconveniencies, during great part of the campaign, until the miſconduct of the enemy turned the ſcale in their favour. In the mean time, the prince thought proper to begin his retreat in the night towards Fulda, in which his rear ſuffered conſiderably from a body of the enemy's light troops, under the command of M. de Blatſel, who ſurpriſed two ſquadrons of dragoons, and a battalion of grenadiers. The firſt were taken or diſperſed; the laſt eſcaped with the loſs of their baggage. The allied army returned to their cantonments about Munſter, and the prince began to make preparations for taking the field in earneſt.

While the French enjoyed plenty in the neighbourhood of Duſſeldorp and Crevelt, by means of the Rhine, the allies laboured under a dearth and ſcarcity of every ſpecies of proviſion, becauſe the country which they occupied was already exhauſted, and all the ſupplies were brought from an immenſe diſtance. The ſingle article of forage occaſioned ſuch enormous expence, as alarmed the adminiſtration of Great-Britain, who, in order to prevent miſmanagement and fraud for the future, nominated a member of parliament inſpector-general of the forage, and ſent him over to Germany in the beginning of the year, with the rank and appointments of a general officer, that the importance of his character, and the nature of his office, might be a chec upon thoſe who were ſuſpected of iniquitous appropriations. This gentleman is ſaid to have met with ſuch a cold reception, and ſo many mortifications in the execution of his office, that he was in a very little time ſic of his employment. An enquiry into the cauſes of this reception, and of the practices which rendered it neceſſary to appoint ſuch a ſuperintendant, may be the province of ſome future hiſtorian, when truth may be iveſtigated freely, without any apprehenſion of pains and penalties.

While great part of the allied army remained in cantonments about Munſter, the French armies on the Upper and Lower Rhine, being put in motion, joined of the 3d day of June near Marpurg, under the command of the mareſchal de Contades, who advanced to the northward, and fixed his head-quarters at Corbach; from whence he detached a body of light troops to take poſſeſſion of Caſſel, which at his approach was abandoned by general Imhoff. The French army being encamped at Stadtberg, the duke de Broglio, who commanded the right wing, advanced from Caſſel into the territories of Hanover, where he occupied Gottingen without oppoſition; while the allied army aſſembled in the neighbourhood of Lipſtadt, and encamped about Soeſt and Werle. Prince Ferdinand, finding himſelf inferior to the united forces of the enemy, was obliged to retire as they advanced, after having left ſtrong garriſons in Lipſtadt, Retberg, Munſter, and Minden. Theſe precautions, however ſeemed to produce little effect in his favour. Retberg was ſurpriſed by the duke de Broglio, who likewiſe took Minden by aſſault, and made general Zaſtrow, with his garriſon of 1500 men priſoners of war; a misfortune conſiderably aggravated by the loſs of an immenſe magazine of hay and corn, which fell into the hands of the enemy. They likewiſe made themſelves maſters of Munſter, inveſted Lipſtadt, and all their operations were hitherto crowned with ſucceſs. The regency of Hanover, alarmed at their progreſs, reſolved to provide for the worſt, by ſending their chancery and moſt valuable effects to Stade, from whence, in caſe of neceſſity, they might be conveyed by ſea to England. In the mean time, they exerted all their induſtry in preſſing men for recruiting and re-enforcing the army under prince Ferdinand, who ſtill continued to retire; and on the 11th day of July removed his head-quarters from Oſnabruck to Bomte, near the Weſer. Here having received advice that Minden was taken by the French, he ſent forwards a detachment to ſecure the poſt of Soltznau on that river, where on the 15th he encamped.

The general of the allied army had for ſome time exhibited marks of animoſity towards lord George Sackville, the ſecond in command, whoſe extenſive underſtanding, penetrating eye, and inquiſitive ſpirit, could neither be deceived, dazzled, nor ſoothed into tame acquieſcence. He had oppoſed, with all his influence, a deſign of retiring towards the frontiers of Brunſwick, in order to cover that country. He ſupported his oppoſition, by alledging that it was the enemy's favourite object to cut off their communication with the Weſer and the Elbe; in which, ſhould they ſucceed, it would be found impoſſible to tranſport the Britiſh troops to their own country, which was, at that time threatened with an invaſion. He therefore, inſiſted on the army's retreating, ſo as to keep the communication open with Stade, where, in caſe of emergency, the Engliſh troops might be embarked. By adhering tenaciouſly to this opinion, and exhibiting other inſtances of a prying depoſition, he had rendered himſelf ſo diſagreeable to the commander in chief, that, in all appearance, nothing was ſo eagerly deſired as an opportunity of removing him from the ſtation he filled.

Mean while, the French general, advancing to Minden, encamped in a ſtrong ſituation, having that town on his right, a ſteep hill on his left, a moraſs in front, and rivulet in rear. The duke de Broglio commanded a ſeparate body between Hanſbergen and Minden, on the other ſide of the Weſer; and a third, under the duke de Briſſac, conſiſting of 8000 men, occupied a ſtrong poſt by the village of Coveldt, to facilitate the rout of the convoys from Paderborn. Prince Ferdinand having moved his camp from Soltznau to Peterſhagen, detached the hereditary prince on the 28th day of July to Lubeke from whence he drove the enemy; and proceeding to Rimſel, was joined by major-general Dreves, who had retaken Oſnabruck, and cleared all that neighbourhood of the enemy's parties: then he advanced towards Hervorden, and fixed his quarters at Kirchlinneger, to hamper the enemy's convoys from Parderborn. During theſe tranſactions, prince Ferdinand marched with the allied army in three columns from Peterſhagen to Hille, where it encamped, having a moraſs on the right, the village of Fredewalde on the left, and in front thoſe of Northemmern and Holtzenhauſen. Fifteen battalions and nineteen ſquadrons, with a brigade of heavy artillery, where left under the command of general Wangenheim, on the left, behind the village of Dodenhauſen, which was fortified with ſome redoubts, defended by two battalions. Colonel Luckner, with the Hanoverian huſſars, and a brigade of hunters, ſuſtained by two battalions of grenadiers, was poſted between Buckebourg, and the Weſer, to obſerve the body of troops commanded by the duke de Broglio on the other ſide of the river.

On the laſt day of July, the mareſchal de Contades reſolving to attac the allied army, ordered the corps of Broglio to repaſs the river; and advancing in eight columns, about midnight paſſed the rivulet of Barta, that runs along the moraſs, and falls into the Weſer at Minden. At day break he formed his army in order of battle, part of it fronting the corps of general Wangenheim at Dodenhauſen, and part of it facing Hille; the two wings conſiſting of infantry, and the cavalry being ſtationed in the centre. At three in the morning the enemy began to cannonade the prince's quarters at Hille from a battery of ſix cannon, which they had raiſed in the preceding evening, on the dike of Eickhorſt. This was probably the firſt intimation he received of their intention. He forthwith cauſed two pieces of artillery to be conveyed to Hille, and ordered the officer of the piquet-guard poſted there to defend himſelf to the laſt extremity: at the ſame time, ſent orders to general Gieſen, who occupied Lubeke, to attac the enemy's poſt at Eickhorſt; and this ſervice was ſucceſsfully performed. The prince of Anhalt, lieutenant-general for the day, took poſſeſſion with the reſt of the piquets of the village of Halen, where prince Ferdinand reſolved to ſupport his right. It was already in the hands of the enemy, but they ſoon abandoned it with precipitation. The allied army, being put in motion, advanced in eight columns, and occupied the ground between Halen and Hemmern, while general Wangenheim's corps filled up the ſpace between this laſt village and Dodenhauſen. The enemy made their principal effort on the left, intending to force the infantry of Wangenheim's corps, and penetrate between it and the body of the allied army. For this purpoſe, the duke de Broglio attacked them with great fury, but was ſeverely checked by a battery of thirty cannon, prepared for his reception by the count de Buckebourg, grand-maſter of the artillery, and ſerved with admirable effect, under his own eye and direction. About five in the morning both armies cannonaded each other; at ſix the fire of muſquetry began with great vivacity, and the action became very hot towards the right, where ſix regiments of Engliſh infantry, and two battalions of Hanoverian guards, not only bore the whole brunt of the French carabineers and gendarmerie, but abſolutely broke every body of horſe and foot that advanced to attac them on the left and in the centre. The Heſſian cavalry, with ſome regiments of Holſtein, Pruſſian, and Hanoverian dragoons poſted on the left, performed good ſervice. The cavalry on the right had no opportunity of engaging. They were deſtined to ſupport the infantry of the third line; they conſiſted of the Britiſh and Hanoverian horſe, commanded by lord George Sackville, whoſe ſecond was the marquis of Granby. They were poſted at a conſiderable diſtance from the firſt line of infantry, and divided from it by a ſcanty wood that bordered on a heath. Orders were ſent, during the action, to bring them up, but whether theſe orders were contradictory, unintelligible, or imperfectly executed, they did not arrive in time to have any ſhare in the action[w]; nor, indeed, were they originally intended for that purpoſe; nor was there the leaſt

[w] That the general was not pleaſed with the behaviour of lord George Sackville, may be gathered from the following compliment to the marquis of Granby, implying a ſevere reflexion upon his ſuperior in command:

Orders of his Serene Highneſs Prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, relative to the behaviour of the troops under him at the famous battle near Minden, on the 1ſt of Auguſt, 1759.

'HIS ſerene highneſs orders his greateſt thanks to be given to the whole army, for their bravery and good behaviour yeſterday, particularly to the Engliſh infantry, and the two battalions of Hanoverian guards: to all the cavalry of the left wing, and to general Wangenheim's corps, particularly the regiment of Holſtein, the Heſſian cavalry, the Hanoverian regiment du Corps, and Hammerſtin's; the ſame to all the brigades of heavy artillery. His ſerene highneſs declares publicly, that next to God he attributes the glory of the day to the intrepidity and extraordinary good behaviour of theſe troops, which he aſſures them he ſhall retain the ſtrongeſt ſenſe of as long as he lives; and if ever, upon any occaſion, he ſhall be able to ſerve theſe brave troops, or any of them in particular, it will give him the utmoſt pleaſure. His ſerene highneſs orders his particular thanks to be likewiſe given to general Sporcken, the duke of Holſtein, lieutenant-generals Imhoff and Urf. His ſerene highneſs is extremely obliged to the count de Buckebourg, for his extraordinary care and trouble in the management of the artillery, which was ſerved with great effect; likewiſe to the commanding officers of the ſeveral brigades of artillery, viz. Colonel Browne, lieutenant-colonel Hutte, major Haſſe, and the three Engliſh captains, Philips, Drummond, and Foy. His ſerene highneſs thinks himſelf infinitely obliged to major-generals Waldegrave and Kingſley, for their great courage, and good order in which they conducted their brigades. His ſerene highneſs further orders it to be declared to lieutenant-general the marquis of Granby, that he is perſuaded, that if he had had the good fortune to have had him at the head of the cavalry of the right wing, his preſence would have greatly contributed to make the deciſion of that day more complete and more brilliant. In ſhort, his ſerene highneſs orders that thoſe of his ſuite whoſe behaviour he moſt admired be named, as the duke of Richmond, colonel Fitzroy, captain Ligonier, colonel Watſon, captain Wilſon, aide-du-camp to major-general Waldegrave, adjutants-generals Erſtoff, Bulow, Durendolle, the count Tobe, and Malerti; his ſerene highneſs having much reaſon to be ſatisfied with their conduct. And his ſerene highneſs deſires and orders the generals of the army, that upon all occaſions when orders are brought to them by his aides-du camp, that they may be obeyed punctually, and without delay.'

London Engraved for Harrisons Edition of Rapin

The Battle of Minden, or Thornhausen, in Westphalia, where the Allied Army, commanded by Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick-Wolfenbuttle, obtained a glorious Victory over the French army, commanded by Marshal de Contades, Aug.t 1.1759.

Published as the Act directs Nov.r 5.1745.

BRITISH MUSEUM
15 JY 60

occaſion for their ſervice; nor could they have come up in time and condition to perform effectual ſervice, had the orders been explicit and conſiſtent, and the commander acted with all poſſible expedition. Be that as it will, the enemy were repulſed in all their attacs with conſiderable loſs: at length they gave way in every part; and about noon, abandoning the field of battle, were purſued to the ramparts of Minden. In this action they loſt a great number of men, with 43 large cannon, and many colours and ſtandards; whereas the loſs of the allies was very inconſiderable, as it chiefly fell upon a few regiments of Britiſh infantry, commanded by the major-generals Waldegrave and Kingſley. To the extraordinary proweſs of theſe gallant brigades, and the fire of the Britiſh artillery, which was admirably ſerved by the captains Philips, Macbean, Drummond, and Foy, the victory was in a great meaſure aſcribed. The ſame night the enemy paſſed the Weſer, and burned the bridges over that river. Next day the garriſon of Minden ſurrendered at diſcretion, and here the victors found a great number of French officers wounded.

At firſt the mareſchal de Contades ſeemed inclined to retreat through the defiles of Wittekendſtein, to Paderborn; but he was fain to change his reſolution, in conſequence of his having received advice, that on the very day of his own defeat the duke de Briſſac was vanquiſhed by the hereditary prince in the neighbourhood of Coveldt, ſo that the paſſage of the mountains was rendered impracticable. The duke de Briſſac had been advantageouſly encamped with his left to the village of Coveldt, having the Werra in his front, and his right extending to the ſaltpits. In this advantageous ſituation he was attacked by the hereditary prince and general de Kilmanſeg with ſuch vivacity and addreſs, that his troops were totally routed, with the loſs of ſix cannon, and a conſiderable number of men killed, wounded, or taken priſoners. After the battle of Minden, colonel Freytag, at the head of the light troops, took, in the neighbourhood of Detmold, all the equipage of the mareſchal de Contades, the prince of Condé, and the duke de Briſſac, with part of their military cheſt and chancery, containing papers of the utmoſt conſequence[x].

Prince Ferdinand having garriſoned Minden, marched to Hervorden; and the hereditary prince paſſed the Weſer at Hamelen, in order to purſue the enemy, who retreated to Caſſel, and from thence, by the way of Marpurg, as far as Gieſſen. In a word, they were continually harraſſed by that enterprizing prince, who ſeized every opportunity of making an impreſſion upon their army: took the greateſt part of their baggage; and compelled them to abandon every place they poſſeſſed in Weſtphalia. The number of his priſoners amounted to 1500 men, beſides the garriſon left at Caſſel, which ſurrendered at diſcretion. He likewiſe ſurpriſed a whole battalion, and defeated a conſiderable detachment under the command of M. d'Armentieres. In the mean time, the allied army advanced in regular marches; and prince Ferdinand, having taken poſſeſſion of Caſſel, detached general Imhoff, with a body of troops, to reduce the city of Munſter, which he accordingly began to bombard and cannonade; but d'Armentieres, being joined by a freſh body of troops from the lower Rhine, advanced to its relief, and compelled Imhoff to raiſe the ſiege. It was not long, however, before this general was alſo re-enforced; then he meaſured bac his march to Munſter, and the French commander withdrew in his turn. The place was immediately ſhut up by a cloſe blockade; which, however, did not prevent the introduction of ſupplies. The city of Munſter, being an object of importance, was diſputed with great obſtinacy. Armentieres received re-enforcements, and the body commanded by Imhoff was occaſionaly augmented; but the ſiege was not formally undertaken till November, when ſome heavy artillery being brought from England, the place was regularly inveſted, and the operations carried on with ſuch vigour, that in a few days the city ſurrendered on capitulation.

Prince Ferdinand having poſſeſſed himſelf of the town and caſtle of Marpurg, proceeded with the army to Neidar-Weimar, and there encamped; while Contades remained at Gieſſen on the ſouth ſide of the river Lahn, where he was joined by a colleague in the perſon of the mareſchal d'Eſtrees. By this time he was become very unpopular among the troops, on account of the defeat at Minden, which he is ſaid to have charged on the miſconduct of Broglio, who recriminated on him in his turn, and ſeemed to gain credit at the court of Verſailles. While the two armies lay encamped in the neighbourhood of each other, nothing paſſed but ſkirmiſhes among the light troops, and little excurſive expeditions. The French army was employed in removing their magazines, and fortifying Gieſſen, as if their intention was to retreat to Frankfort on the Maine, after having conſumed all the forage, and made a military deſert between the Lahn and that river. In the begining of November, the mareſchal duke de Broglio returned from Paris, and aſſumed the command of the army, from whence Contades and d'Eſtrees immediately retired, with ſeveral other general officers that were ſenior to the new commander.

The duke of Wirtemberg having taken poſſeſſion of Fulda, the hereditary prince of Brunſwick reſolved to beat up his quarters. For this purpoſe he ſelected a body of troops, and began his march from Marpurg early in the morning on the 28th day of November. Next night they lay at Augerbach, where they defeated the volunteers of Naſſau: and at one o'clock in the morning of the 30th, they marched directly to Fulda, where the duke of Wirtemberg, far from expecting ſuch a viſit, had invited all the faſhionable people in Fulda to a ſumptuous entertainment. The hereditary prince, having reconnoitred the [x] The following extracts of letters from the duke de Belleiſle to the mareſchal de Contades will convey ſome idea of the virtue, policy, and neceſſities of the French miniſtry:

'I am ſtill afraid that Fiſcher ſets out too late: it is, however, very important, and very eſſential, that we ſhould raiſe large contributions. I ſee no other reſource for our moſt urgent expences, and for refitting the troops, but in the money we may draw from the enemy's country; from whence we muſt likewiſe procure ſubſiſtence of all kinds (independently of the money) that is to ſay, hay, ſtraw, oats for the winter, bread, corn, cattle, horſes, even men, to recruit our foreign troops. The war muſt not be prolonged, and perhaps it may be neceſſary, according to the events which may happen between this time and the end of September, to make a downright deſert before the line of the quarters which it may be thought proper to keep during the winter, in order that the enemy may be under a real impoſſibility of approaching us: at the ſame time reſerving for ourſelves a bare ſubſiſtence on the rout which may be the moſt convenient for us to take, in the middle of winter, to beat up or ſeize upon the enemy's quarters. That this object may be fulfilled, I cauſe the greateſt aſſiduity to be uſed in preparing what is neceſſary for having all your troops, without exception, well clothed, well armed, well equipped, and well refitted, in every reſpect, before the end of November, with new tents, in order that, if it ſhould be adviſeable for the king's political and military affairs, you may be able to aſſemble the whole, or part of your army, to act offenſively, and with vigour, from the beginning of January; and that you may have the ſatisfaction to ſhow your enemies, and all Europe, that the French know how to act, and carry on war, in all ſeaſons, when they have ſuch a general as you are, and a miniſter of the department of war that can foreſee and concert matters with the general.

'You muſt be ſenſible, ſir, that what I ſay to you may become not only uſeful and honourable, but perhaps even neceſſary, with reſpect to what you know, and of which I ſhall ſay more in my private letter.

'M. Duc de BELLEISLE.'

'After obſerving all the formalities due to the magiſtrates of Cologn, you muſt ſeize on their great artillery by force, telling them, that you do ſo for their own defence againſt the common enemy of the empire; that you will reſtore them when their city has nothing further to fear, &c. After all, you muſt take every thing you have occaſion for, and give them receipts for it.'—

'You muſt, at any rate, conſume all ſorts of ſubſiſtence on the higher Lippe, Paderborn, and Warſburg; you muſt deſtroy every thing which you cannot conſume, ſo as to make a deſert of all Wheſtphalia, from Lipſtadt and Munſter, as far as the Rhine, on one hand: and on the other, from the higher Lippe and Paderborn, as far as Caſſel; that the enemy may find it quite impracticable to direct their march to the Rhine, or the Lower Roer; and this with regard to your army, and with regard to the army under M. de Soubiſe, that they may not have it in their power to take poſſeſſion of Caſſel, and much leſs to march to Marpug, or to the quarters which he will have along the Lahn, or to thoſe which you will occupy, from the lower part of the left ſide of the Roer, and on the right ſide of the Rhine, as far as Duſſeldorp, and at Cologn.'

'You know the neceſſity of conſuming or deſtroying, as far as poſſible all the ſubſiſtance, eſpecially, the forage, betwixt the Weſer and the Rhine on the one hand, and on the other, betwixt the Lippe, the biſhopric of Paderborn, the Dymel, the Fulda, and the Nerra; and ſo to make a deſert of Weſtphalia and Heſſe.'——

'Although the prince of Waldeck appears outwardly neutral, he is very ill diſpoſed, and deſerves very little favour. You ought, therefore, to make no ſcruple of taking all you find in that territory: but this muſt be done in an orderly manner, giving receipts, and obſerving the moſt exact diſcipline. All the ſubſiſtence you leave in his country will fall to the enemy's ſhare who will, by that means, be enabled to advance to the Lahn, and towards the quarters which you are to occupy on the left ſide of the Roer. It is, therefore, a precaution become in a manner indiſpenſible neceſſary, to carry it all away from thence.'——

'The queſtion now is, what plan you ſhall think moſt proper for accompliſhing, in the quickeſt and ſureſt manner, our great purpoſe: which muſt be to conſume, carry off, or deſtroy all the forage and ſubſiſtence of the country which we cannot keep poſſeſſion of.'——

'The upper part of the Lippe, and the country of Paderborn, are the moſt plentiful; they muſt, therefore, be eat to the very roots.'——

'You did mighty well, to talk in the moſt abſolute tone with regard to the neceſſaries Racroth and Duyſbourg muſt furniſh our troops; it is neceſſary to ſpeak in that tone to Germans; and you will find your account in uſing the ſame to the regencies of the elector of Cologn, and ſtill more to that of the Palatine.

'After uſing all becoming ceremony, as we have the power in our hands we muſt make uſe of it, and draw from the country of Bergue what ſhall be neceſſary for the ſubſiſtence of the garriſon of Duſſeldorp, and of the light troops, and reſerve what may be brought thither from Alſace and the biſhoprics for a caſe of neceſſity.'

avenues in perſon, took ſuch meaſures, that the troops of Wirtemberg, who were ſcattered in ſmall bodies, would have been cut off, if they had not haſtily retired into the town, where, however, they found no ſhelter. The prince forced open the gates; and they retreated to the other ſide of the town, where four battalions of them were defeated and taken; while the duke himſelf, with the reſt of his forces, filed off on the other ſide of the Fulda. Two pieces of cannon, two pair of colours, and all their baggage, fell into the hands of the victors; and the hereditary prince advanced as far as Rupertenrade, a place ſituated on the right flank of the French army. Perhaps this motion haſtened the reſolution of the duke de Broglio to abandon Gieſſen, and fall bac to Friedberg, where he eſtabliſhed his head-quarters. The allied army immediately took poſſeſſion of his camp at Kleinlinnes and Heuchelam, and ſeemed to make preparations for the ſiege of Gieſſen.

While both armies remained in this poſition, the duke de Broglio received the ſtaff as mareſchal of France, and made an attempt to beat up the quarters of the allies. Having called in all his detachments, he marched up to them on the 25th day of December; but found them ſo well diſpoſed to give him a warm reception, that he thought proper to lay aſide his deſign, and nothing but a mutual cannonade enſued; then he returned to his former quarters. From Kleinlinnes the allied army removed to Corſdorff, where they were cantoned till the beginning of January, when they fell bac as far as Marpurg, where prince Ferdinand eſtabliſhed his head-quarters. The enemy had by this time retrieved their ſuperiority, in conſequence of the hereditary prince's being detached with 15,000 men to join the king of Pruſſia at Freyberg, in Saxony. Thus, by the victory at Minden, the dominions of Hanover and Brunſwick were preſerved, and the enemy obliged to evacuate great part of Weſtphalia. Perhaps they might have been driven to the other ſide of the Rhine, had not the general of the allies been obliged to weaken his army for the ſupport of the Pruſſian monarch, who had met with divers diſaſters in the courſe of this campaign. It was not to any relaxation or abatement of his uſual vigilence and activity that this warlike prince owed the ſeveral checs he received. Even in the middle of winter, his troops under general Manteuffel, acted with great ſpirit againſt the Swedes in Pomerania. They made themſelves maſters of Damgarten, and ſeveral other places which the Swedes had garriſoned; and, the froſt ſetting in, thoſe who were quartered in the iſle of Uſedom paſſed over the ice to Wolgaſt, which they reduced without much difficulty. They undertook the ſieges of Demmen and Anclam at the ſame time, and the garriſons of both ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, to the number of 2700 men, including officers. In Demmen they found 24 pieces of cannon, with a large quantity of ammunition. In Anclam there was a conſiderable magazine, with 36 cannon, mortars, and howitzers. A large detachment under general Knobloch ſurpriſed Erfurth, and raiſed conſiderable contributions at Gotha, Eiſenach, and Fulda; from whence alſo they conveyed all the forage and proviſions to Saxe-Naumberg. In the latter end of February, the Pruſſian major-general Woberſnow marched with a ſtrong body of troops from Glogau in Sileſia to Poland; and, advancing by the way of Liſſa, attacked the caſtle of the prince Sulkowſki, a poliſh grandee, who had been very active againſt the intereſt of the Pruſſian monarch. After ſome reſiſtance he was obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion, and was ſent priſoner with his whole garriſon to Sileſia. From hence Woberſnow proceeded to Poſna, where he made himſelf maſter of a conſiderable magazine, guarded by 2000 coſſacks, who retired at his approach; and, having deſtroyed ſeveral others, returned to Sileſia. In April, the fort of Penamunde, in Pomerania, was ſurrendered to Manteuffel; and about the ſame time a detachment of Pruſſian troops bombarded Schwerin, the capital of Mecklenburg. Mean while, re-enforcements were ſent to the Ruſſian army in Poland, which in April began to aſſemble upon the Viſtula. The court of Peterſburg had likewiſe begun to equip a large fleet, by means of which the army might be ſupplied with military ſtores and proviſions; but this armament was retarded by an accidential fire at Revel, which deſtroyed all the magazines and materials for ſhip-building to an immenſe value.

About the latter end of March the king of Pruſſia aſſembled his army at Rhonſtock, near Strigau; and advancing to the neighbourhood of Landſhut, encamped at Bolchenhayn. On the other hand, the Auſtrian army, under the command of mareſchal Daun, was aſſembled at Munchengratz, in Bohemia; and the campaign was opened by an exploit of general Beck, who ſurpriſed and made priſoners a battalion of Pruſſian grenadiers, poſted under colonel Duringſheven, at Griefenberg, on the frontiers of Sileſia. This advantage, however, was more than counterbalanced by the activity and ſucceſs of prince Henry, brother to the Pruſſian king, who commanded the army which wintered in Saxony. About the middle of April he marched in two columns towards Bohemia, forced the paſs of Peterſwalde, deſtroyed the Auſtrian magazine at Aſſig, burned their boats upon the Elbe, ſeized the forage and proviſion which the enemy had left at Lowoſitz and Leutmeritz, and demoliſhed a new bridge which they had built for their convenience. At the ſame time, general Hulſen attacked the paſs of Paſsberg, guarded by general Renard, who was taken, with 200 men, including 50 officers: then he advanced to Satz, in hopes of ſecuring the Auſtrian magazines; but theſe the enemy conſumed, that they might not fall into his hands, and retired towards Prague with the utmoſt precipitation.

Prince Henry having happily achieved theſe adventurers, and filled all Bohemia with alarm and conſternation, returned to Saxony, and diſtributed his troops in quarters of refreſhment in the neighbourhood of Dreſden. In a few days, however, they were again put in motion, and marched to Obelgeburgen; from whence he continued his rout through Voightland, in order to attac the army of the empire in Franconia. He accordingly entered this country by the way of Hoff, on the 7th of May, and next day ſent a detachment to attac general Macguire, who commanded a body of imperialiſts at Aſch, and ſuſtained the charge with great gallantry; but finding himſelf in danger of being overpowered by numbers, he retired in the night towards Egra. The army of the empire, commanded by the prince de Deux-Ponts, being unable to cope with the Pruſſian general in the field, retired from Cullembach to Bamberg, and from thence to Nuremberg, where, in all probability, they would not have been ſuffered to remain unmoleſted, had not prince Henry been recalled to Saxony. He had already taken Cronach and the caſtle of Rotenberg, and even advanced as far as Bamberg, when he received advice that a body of Auſtrians, under general Gemmingen, had penetrated into Saxony. This diverſion effectually ſaved the army of the empire, as prince Henry immediately returned to the electorate, after having laid the biſhoprick of Bamberg and the marquiſate of Cullembach under contribution, deſtroyed all the magazines provided for the imperial army, and ſent 1500 priſoners to Leipſick. A party of imperialiſts, under count Palfy, endeavoured to harraſs him in his retreat; but they were defeated near Hoff, with conſiderable ſlaughter nevertheleſs, the imperial army, though now reduced to 10,000 men, returned to Bamberg; and as the Pruſſians approached the frontiers of Saxony, the Auſtrian general, Gemmingen, retired into Bohemia. During all theſe tranſactions, the mareſchal count Daun remained with the grand Auſtrian army at Schurtz, in the circle of Koningſgratz; while the Pruſſians, commanded by the king in perſon, continued quietly encamped between Landſhut and Schweidnitz. General Fouquet commanded a large body of troops in the ſouthern part of Sileſia; but theſe being moſtly withdrawn, in order to oppoſe the Ruſſians, the Auſtrian general, de Fille, who hovered on the frontiers of Moravia, with a conſiderable detachment, took advantage of this circumſtance, and, advancing into Sileſia, encamped within ſight of Neiſs.

As mutual calumny and recrimination of all kinds were not ſpared on either ſide, during the progreſs of this war, the enemies of the Pruſſian monarch did not fail to charge him with cruelties committed at Schwern, the capital of Mecklenburg, which his troops had bombarded, plundered of its archives, cannon, and all its youth fit to carry arms, who were preſſed into his ſervice: he beſides taxed the duchy at 7000 men, and a million of crowns, by way of contribution. He was alſo accuſed of barbarity, in iſſuing an order for removing all the priſoners from Berlin to Spandau; but this ſtep he juſtified, in a letter to his miniſters at foreign courts, declaring that he had provided for all the officers that were his priſoners the beſt accommodation, and permitted them to reſide in his capital; that ſome of them had groſsly abuſed the liberty they enjoyed, by maintaining illicit correſpondence, and other practices equally offenſive, which had obliged him to remove them to the town of Spandau: he deſired, however, that the town might not be confounded with the fortreſs of that name, from which it was entirely ſeparated, and in which they would enjoy the ſame eaſe they had found at Berlin, though under more vigilant inſpection. His conduct, on this occaſion, he ſaid was ſufficiently authoriſed, not only by the law of nations, but alſo by the example of his enemies; inaſmuch as the empreſs-queen had never ſuffered any of his officers, who had fallen into her hands, to reſide at Vienna; and the court of Ruſſia had ſent ſome of them as far as Caſan. He concluded with ſaying, that as his enemies had let ſlip no opportunity of blackening his moſt innocent proceedings, he had thought proper to acquaint his miniſters with his reaſons for making this alteration with regard to his priſoners, whether French, Auſtrians, or Ruſſians.

In the beginning of June, the king of Pruſſia, underſtanding that the Ruſſian army had begun their march from the Viſtula, ordered the ſeveral bodies of his troops, under Hulſen and Woberſnow, re-enforced by detachments from his other armies, to join the forces under count Dohna, as general in chief, and march into Poland. Accordingly, they advanced to Meritz, where the count having publiſhed a declaration[y], he continued his march towards Poſna, where he found the Ruſſian army under count Soltikoff ſtrongly encamped, having in their rear that city and the river Warta, and in their front a formidable entrenchment, mounted with a great number of cannon. Count Dohna judging it impracticable to attac them in this ſituation with any proſpect of ſucceſs, endeavoured to intercept their convoys in the eaſtward; but for want of proviſion, was in a little time obliged to return towards the Oder: then the Ruſſians advanced to Zullichaw, in Sileſia. The king of Pruſſia thinking count Dohna had been rather too cautious, conſidering the emergency of his affairs, gave him leave to retire for the benefit of his health, and conferred his command upon general Wedel, who reſolved to give the Ruſſians battle without delay. Thus determined, he marched againſt them in two columns; and on the 23d day of July, attacked them at Kay, near Zullichaw, where, after a very obſtinate engagement, he was repulſed with great loſs, Woberſnow, being killed, and Manteuffel wounded in the action; and in a few days the Ruſſians made themſelves maſters of Franckfort upon the Oder.

By this time, the armies of count Daun and the king of Pruſſia had made ſeveral motions. The Auſtrians having quitted their camp at Schurtz, advanced towards Zittau in Luſatia, where having halted a few days, they reſumed their march, and encamped at Gorlithayn, between Sudenberg and Mark-Liſſau. His Pruſſian majeſty, in order to obſerve their motions, marched by the way of Herchberg to Lahn; and his vanguard ſkirmiſhed with that of the Auſtrians commanded by Laudohn, who entered Sileſia by the way of Grieffenberg. The Auſtrian general was obliged to retreat with loſs; while the king penetrated into Sileſia, that he might be at hand to act againſt the Ruſſians, whoſe progreſs was now become the chief object of his apprehenſion. He no ſooner received intimation that Wedel had been worſted, than he marched with a ſelect body of 10,000 men from his camp in Sileſia, in order to take upon him the command of Wedel's army, leaving the reſt of his forces ſtrongly encamped, under the direction of his brother prince Henry, who had joined him before this event. Count Daun being appriſed of the king's intention, and knowing the Ruſſians were very defective in cavalry, immediately detached a body of 12,000 horſe, to join them, under the command of Loudohn; and theſe penetrating in two columns through Sileſia and Luſatia, with ſome loſs, arrived in the Ruſſian camp at a very critical juncture. Mean while the king of Pruſſia joined general Wedel on the fourth day of Auguſt at Muhlroſe, where he aſſumed the command of the army: but finding it greatly inferior to the enemy, he recalled general Finck, whom he had detached ſome time before, with a body of 9000 men, to oppoſe the progreſs of the imperialiſts in Saxony: for when prince Henry joined his brother in Sileſia the army of the empire had entered that electorate. Thus re-enforced, the number of the king's army at Muhlroſe did not exceed 50,000, whereas the Ruſſians were more numerous by 30,000. They had choſen a ſtrong camp at the village of Cunerſdorf, almoſt oppoſite to Franckfort upon the Oder, and increaſed the natural ſtrength of their ſituation by intrenchments mounted with a numerous artillery. In other circumſtances it might have been deemed a raſh and ridiculous enterprize to attac ſuch an army under ſuch complicated diſadvantages; but here was no room for heſitation. The king's affairs ſeemed to require a deſperate effort; and perhaps he was partly impelled by ſelf-confidence and animoſity.

Having determined to hazard an attac, he made his diſpoſition, and on the 12th day of Auguſt, at two in the morning, his troops were in motion. The army being formed in a wood, advanced towards the enemy; and about 11 the action was begun with a ſevere cannonade. This having produced the deſired effect, he charged the left wing of the Ruſſian army with his beſt troops formed in columns. After a very obſtinate diſpute the enemy's entrenchments were forced with great ſlaughter, and 70 pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the Pruſſians. A narrow defile was afterwards paſſed, and ſeveral redoubts that covered the village of Cunerſdorf were taken by aſſault, one after another: one half of the taſk was not yet performed: the Ruſſians made a firm ſtand at the village; but they were overborne by the impetuoſity of the Pruſſians, who drove them from poſt to poſt up the laſt redoubts they had to defend. As the Ruſſians kept their ground until they were hewn down in their ranks, this ſucceſs was not acquired without infinite labour, and a conſiderable expence of blood. After a furious conteſt of ſix hours, fortune ſeemed to declare ſo much in favour of the Pruſſians, that the king diſpatched the following billet to the queen at Berlin:

'Madam,

'We have driven the Ruſſians from their entrenchments. In two hours expect to hear of a glorious victory.'

This intimation was permature, and ſubjected the writer to the ridicule of his enemies. The Ruſſians were ſtaggered, not routed. General Soltikoff rallied his troops, and re-enforced his left wing under cover of a redoubt, which was erected on an eminence called the Jews' Burying-ground, and here they ſtood in order of battle, with the moſt reſolute countenance; favoured by the ſituation, which was naturally difficult of acceſs, and now rendered almoſt impregnable by the fortification, and a numerous artillery, ſtill greately ſuperior to that of the Pruſſians. Had the king contented himſelf with the advantage already gained, all the world would have acknowledged he had fought againſt terrible odds with aſtoniſhing proweſs; and that he judiciouſly deſiſted, when he could no longer perſevere without incurring the imputation of being actuated

[y] The following declarations were publiſhed by count Dohna, a Pruſſian general, on his entering Poland with a body of Pruſſian troops.

On the 15th of June.

HIS Pruſſian majeſty, finding himſelf under a neceſſity to cauſe part of his armies to enter the territories of the republic of Poland, in order to protect them againſt the threatened invaſion of the enemy, declares, that,

It muſt not be underſtood that his majeſty, by this ſtep taken, intends to make any breach in the regard he has always had for the illuſtrious republic of Poland, or to leſſen the good underſtanding which has hitherto ſubſiſted between them, but, on the contrary, to ſtrengthen the ſame, in expectation that the illuſtrious republic will, on its part, act with the like neighbourly and friendly good-will as is granted to the enemy, than which nothing more is deſired.

The nobility, gentry, and magiſtracy, in their reſpective diſtricts, between the frontiers of Pruſſia, ſo far as beyond Poſen, are required to furniſh all kinds of proviſions, corn, and forage neceſſary to ſupport an army of 40,000 men, with the utmoſt diſpatch, with an aſſurance of being paid ready-money for the ſame. But, if contrary to expectation, any deficiency ſhould happen in ſupplying this demand, his majeſty's troops will be obliged to forage, and uſe the ſame means as thoſe taken by the enemy for their ſubſiſtence.

In confidence thereof, that the ſeveral juriſdictions upon the Pruſſian frontiers within the territories of Poland, will exert themſelves to comply with this demand as ſoon as poſſible, for the ſubſiſtence of the royal army of Pruſſia, they are aſſured that thereby all diſorders will be prevented, and whatever is delivered will be paid for in ready-money.

On the 17th of June.

It is with the greateſt aſtoniſhment that the king, my moſt gracious lord and maſter, heard that ſeveral of his own ſubjects had ſuffered themſelves to be ſeduced from their allegiance ſo far as to enter into the ſervice of a potentate with whom he is at war; his majeſty, therefore, makes known by theſe preſents, that all of his ſubjects ſerving in the enemies armies, who ſhall be taken with arms in their hands, ſhall, agreeably to all laws, be ſentenced to be hanged without mercy, as traitors to their king and country. Of which all whom it may concern are deſiaed to take notice, &c.

On the 22d of June.

We invite and deſire that the nobility, archbiſhops, biſhops, abbeys, convents, ſeignories, magiſtrates, and inhabitants of the republic of Poland, on the road of Poſnania, and beyond it, would repair in perſon, or by deputies, in the courſe of this week, or as ſoon after as poſſible, to the Pruſſian head-quarters, there to treat with the commander in chief, or to the commiſſary at war, for the delivery of forage and proviſions for the ſubſiſtence of the army, to be paid with ready-money.

We promiſe and aſſure ourſelves, that no perſon in Poland will attempt to ſeduce the Pruſſian troops to deſert; that no aſſiſtance will be given them in ſuch perfidious practices; that they will neither be ſheltered, concealed, or lodged; which would be followed by very diſagreeable conſequences; we expect, on the contrary, that perſons of all ranks and conditions will ſtop any run-away or deſerter, and deliver him up at the firſt advanced poſt, or at the head-quarters; and all expences attending the ſame ſhall be paid, and a reaſonable gratification ſuperadded.

If any one hath inclination to enter into the king of Pruſſia's ſervice, with an intention to behave well and faithfully, he may apply to the head-quarters, and be aſſured of a capitulation for three or four years.

If any prince or member of the republic of Poland be diſpoſed to aſſemble a body of men, and to join in a troop, or in company of the Pruſſian army, to make a common cauſe with it, he may depend on a gracious reception, and that due regard will be ſhown to his merit, &c.

by frenzy or deſpair. His troops had not only ſuffered ſeverely from the enemy's fire, which was cloſe, deliberate, and well directed, but they were fatigued by the hard ſervice, and fainting with the heat of the day, which was exceſſive. His general officers are ſaid to have reminded him of all theſe circumſtances; and to have diſſuaded him from hazarding an attempt attended with ſuch danger and difficuly, as even an army of freſh troops could hardly hope to ſurmount. He rejected this ſalutary advice, and ordered his infantry to begin a new attac, which being an enterprize beyond their ſtrength, they were repulſed with great ſlaughter. Being afterwards rallied, they returned to the charge: they miſcarried again, and their loſs was redoubled. Being thus rendered unfit for further ſervice, the cavalry ſucceeded to the attac, and repeated their unſucceſsful efforts until they were almoſt broke, and entirely exhauſted. At this critical juncture, the whole body of the Auſtrian and Ruſſian cavalry, which had hitherto remained inactive, and were therefore freſh and in ſpirits, fell in among the Pruſſian horſe with great fury, broke their line at the firſt charge, and forcing them bac upon the infantry, threw them into ſuch diſorder as could not be repaired. The Pruſſian army being thus involved in confuſion, was ſeized with a panic, and in a few minutes totally defeated and diſperſed, notwithſtanding the perſonal efforts of the king, who hazarded his life in the hotteſt parts of the battle, led on his troops three times to the charge, had two horſes killed under him, and his clothes in ſeveral parts penetrated with muſquet-balls. His army being routed, and the greater part of his generals either killed or diſabled by wounds, nothing but the approach of night could have ſaved him from total ruin. When he abandoned the field of battle, he diſpatched another billet to the queen, couched in theſe terms: 'Remove from Berlin with the royal family. Let the archieves be carried to Potſdam. The town may make conditions with the enemy.' The horror and confuſion which this intimation produced at Berlin may be eaſily conceived: horror the more aggravated, as it ſeized them in the midſt of their rejoicing occaſioned by the firſt diſpatch; and this was ſtill more dreadfully augmented, by a ſubſequent indiſtinct relation, importing that the army was totally routed, the king miſſing, and the enemy in full march to Berlin. The battle of Cunerſdorf was by far the moſt bloody action that had happened ſince the commencement of hoſtilities. The carnage was truely horrible: above 20,000 Pruſſians lay dead on the field, and among theſe general Putkammer. The generals Seidlitz, Itzenplitz, Hulſen, Finck, and Wedel, the prince of Wirtemberg, and five major-generals were wounded. The loſs of the enemy amounted to 10,000. It muſt be owned, that if the king was prodigal of his own perſon, he was likewiſe very free with the lives of his ſubjects. At no time, ſince the days of ignorance and barbarity, were the lives of men ſquandered away with ſuch profuſion as in the courſe of this German war. They were not only unneceſſarily ſacrificed in various exploits of no conſequence, but laviſhly expoſed to all the rigour and diſtemper of winter-campaigns, which were introduced on the continent, in deſpight of nature, and in contempt of humanity. Such are the improvements of warriors without feeling! ſuch the refinements of German diſcipline! On the day that ſucceeded the defeat at Cunerſdorf, the king of Pruſſia having loſt the beſt part of his army, together with his whole train of artillery, re-paſſed the Oder, and encamped at Retwin; from whence he advanced to Fuſtenwalde, and ſaw with aſtoniſhment the forbearance of the enemy. Inſtead of taking poſſeſſion of Berlin, and overwhelming the wrec of the king's troops, deſtitute of cannon, and cut off from all communication with prince Henry, they took no ſtep to improve the victory they had gained. Laudohn retired with his horſe immediately after the battle, and count Soltikoff marched with part of the Ruſſians into Luſatia, where he joined Daun, and held conſultations with that general. Perhaps the ſafety of the Pruſſian monarch was owing to the jealouſies ſubſiſting among his enemies. In all probability, the court of Vianna would have been chagrined to ſee the Ruſſians in poſſeſſion of Brandenburgh, and therefore thwarted their deſigns upon that electorate. The king of Pruſſia had now reaſon to be convinced that his ſituation could not juſtify ſuch a deſperate attac as that in which he had miſcarried at Cunerſdorf; for if the Ruſſians did not attempt the reduction of this capital, now that he was totally defeated, and the flower of his army cut off, they certainly would not have aſpired at that conqueſt while he lay encamped in the neighbourhood with 50,000 veterans, inured to war, accuſtomed to conquer, confident of ſucceſs, and well ſupplied with proviſion, ammunition, and artillery. As the victors allowed him time to breathe, he improved this interval with equal ſpirit and ſagacity. He re-aſſembled and refreſhed his broken troops; he furniſhed his camp with cannon from the arſenal at Berlin, which likewiſe ſupplied him with a conſiderable number of recruits: he recalled general Kleiſt, with 5000 men, from Pomerania; and in a little time retrieved his former importance.

The army of the empire having entered Saxony, where it reduced Leipſick, Torgau, and even took poſſeſſion of Dreſden itſelf, the king detached 6000 men under general Wunch, to chec the progreſs of the imperialiſts in that electorate; and perceiving the Ruſſians intended to beſiege Great-Glogau, he, with the reſt of his army, took poſt between them and that city, ſo as to fruſtrate their deſign. While the four great armies, commanded by the king of Pruſſia, general Soltikoff, prince Henry, and count Daun, lay encamped in Luſatia, and on the borders of Sileſia, watching the motions of each other, the war was carried on by detachments with great vivacity. general Wunch having retaken Leipſick, and joined Finck at Eulinbourg, the united body began their march towards Dreſden; and a detachment from the army of the empire, which had encamped near Dobelin, retired at their approach. As they advanced to Noſſin, general Haddick abandoned the advantageous poſts he occupied near Roth-Scemberg, and, being joined by the whole army of the empire, reſolved to attac the Pruſſian generals, who now encamped at Corbitz near Meiſſen; accordingly, on the 21ſt day of September, he advanced againſt them, and endeavoured to diſlodge them by a furious cannonade, which was mutually maintained from morning to night, when he found himſelf obliged to retire with conſiderable loſs, leaving the field of battle, with about 500 priſoners, in the hands of the Pruſſians.

This advantage was ſucceeded by another exploit of prince Henry, who, on the 23d day of the month, quitted his camp at Hornſdorf, near Gorlitz, and, after an incredible march of eleven German miles, by the way of Rothenberg, arrived, about five in the afternoon, at Hoyerſwerda, where he ſurpriſed a body of 4000 men, commanded by general Vehla, killed 600, and made twice that number priſoners; including the commander himſelf. After this achievement he joined the corps of Finck and Wunch; while mareſchal Daun likewiſe abandoned his camp in Luſatia, and made a forced march to Dreſden, in order to fruſtrate the prince's ſuppoſed deſign on that capital. The Ruſſians, diſappointed in there ſcheme upon Glogau, had repaſſed the Oder at Neuſalze, and were encamped at Frauſtadt; general Laudohn, with a body Auſtrians, lay at Sclichtinſkeim; and the king of Pruſſia at Koben; all three on or near the banks of that River. Prince Henry perceiving his army almoſt ſurrounded by Auſtrian detachments, ordered general Finck to drive them from Vogelſang, which they abandoned accordingly; and ſent Wunch, with ſix battalions and ſome cavalry, acroſs the Elbe, to join the corps of general Rebentiſh at Wittenburg, whither he retired from Duben at the approach of the Auſtrians. On the 29th day of October the duke d'Aremberg, with 16,000 Auſtrians, decamped from Dammitch, in order to occupy the heights near Pretſch, and was encountred by general Wunch, who being poſted on two riſing grounds, cannonaded the Auſtrians on their march with conſiderable effect, and the prince took 1200 priſoners, including lieutenant-general Gemmingen, and twenty inferior officers, with ſome cannon, great part of their tents, and a large quantity of baggage. The duke was obliged to change his rout, while Wunch marched from Duben to Eulenburg; and general Waſſerſleben occupied Strehla, where next day the whole army encamped. In this ſituation the prince remained till the 16th day of November, when being in danger of having his communication with Torgau cut off by the enemy, he removed to a ſtrong camp, where his left flank was covered with that city and the river Elbe: his right being ſecured by a wood, and great part of his front by an impaſſable moraſs. Here he was re-enforced with about 20,000 men from Sileſia, and joined by the king himſelf, who forthwith detached general Finck, with 19 battalions and 35 ſquadrons, to take poſſeſſion of the defiles of Maxen and Ottendorf, with a view to hinder the retreat of the Auſtrians to Bohemia. This motion obliged Daun to retire to Plauen; and the king advanced to Wilſdurf, imagining that he had effectually ſucceeded in his deſign. Letters were ſent to Berlin and Magdebourg, importing, that count Daun would be forced to hazard a battle, as he had now no reſource but in victory. Finck had no ſooner taken poſt on the hill near the village of Maxen, than the Auſtrian general ſent officers to reconnoitre his ſituation, and immediately reſolved to attac him with the corps de reſerve under the baron de Sincere, which was encamped in the neighbourhood of Dippodeſwalda. It was forthwith divided into four columns, which filed off through the neighbouring woods; and the Pruſſians never dreamed of their approach until they ſaw themſelves entirely ſurrounded. In this emergency they defendeded themſelves with their cannon and muſketry until they were overpowered by numbers, and their battery was taken; then they retired to another riſing-ground, where they rallied, but were driven from eminence to eminence, until, by favour of the night, they made their laſt retreat to Falkenhayn. In the mean time, count Daun had made ſuch diſpoſitions, that at day-break general Finck found himſelf entirely encloſed, without the leaſt poſſibility of eſcaping, and ſent a trumpet to count Daun, to demand a capitulation. This was granted in one ſingle article, importing, That he and eight other Pruſſian generals, with their whole body of troops they commanded, ſhould be received as priſoners of war. He was obliged to ſubmit, and his whole corps, amounting to 19 battalions and 35 ſquadrons, with 64 pieces of cannon, 50 pair of colours, and 25 ſtandards, fell into the hands of the Auſtrian general. This misfortune was the more mortifying to the king of Pruſſia, as it implied a cenſure on his conduct, for having detached ſuch a numerous body of troops to a ſituation where they could not be ſuſtained by the reſt of his army. On the other hand, the court of Vienna exulted in this victory, as an infallible proof of Daun's ſuperior talents; and, in point of glory and advantage, much more than an equivalent for the loſs of the Saxon army, which, though leſs numerous, capitulated in the year 1756, after having held out ſix weeks againſt the whole power of the Pruſſian monarch. General Hulſen had been detached, with about nine battalions and 30 ſquadrons, to the aſſiſtance of Finck; but he arrived at Klingenberg too late to be of any ſervice; and, being recalled, was next day ſent to occupy the important poſt of Freyberg.

The defeat of general Finck was not the only diſaſter which befel the Pruſſians at the cloſe of this campaign. General Diercke, who was poſted with ſeven battalions of infantry, and 1000 horſe, on the right bank of the Elbe, oppoſite to Meiſſen, finding it impracticable to lay a bridge of pontoons acroſs the river, on account of the floating ice, was obliged to tranſport his troops in boats; and when all were paſſed, except himſelf, with the rear-guard, conſiſting of three battalions, he was, on the 3d day of December, in the morning, attacked by a ſtrong body of Auſtrians, and taken, with all his men, after an obſtinate diſpute. The king of Pruſſia, weakened by theſe two ſucceſſive defeats, that happened in the rear of an unfortunate campaign, would hardly have been able to maintain his ground at Freyberg, had not he been at this juncture re-enforced by the body of troops under the command of the hereditary prince of Brunſwick. As for Daun, the advantages he had gained did not elevate his mind above the uſual maxims of his cautious diſcretion. Inſtead of attacking the king of Pruſſia, reſpectable and formidable even in adverſity, he quietly occupied the ſtrong camp at Pirna, where he might be at hand to ſuccour Dreſden, in caſe it ſhould be attacked, and maintain his communication with Bohemia.

By this time the Ruſſians had retired to winter-quarters in Poland; and the Swedes, after a fruitleſs excurſion in the abſence of Manteuffel, retreated to Stralſund and the iſle of Rugen. This campaign, therefore, did not prove more deciſive than the laſt. Abundance of lives were loſt, and great part of Germany was expoſed to rapine, murder, famine, deſolation, and every ſpecies of miſery that war could engender. In vain the confederating powers of Auſtria, Ruſſia, and Sweden united their efforts to cruſh the Pruſſian monarch. Though his army had been defeated, and he himſelf totally overthrown, with great ſlaughter, in the heart of his own dominions, though he appeared in a deſperate ſituation, environed by hoſtile armies, and two conſiderable detached bodies of his troops were taken or deſtroyed; yet he kept all his adverſaries at bay till the approach of winter, which proved his beſt auxiliary; and even maintained his footing in the electorate of Saxony, which ſeemed to be the prize conteſted between him and the Auſtrian general. Yet, long before the approach of winter one would imagine he muſt have been cruſhed between the ſhoc of ſo many adverſe hoſts, had they been intent upon cloſing him in, and heartily concurred for his deſtruction: but, inſtead of urging the war with accumulated force, they acted in ſeparate bodies, and with jealous eyes ſeemed to regard the progreſs of each other. It was not, therefore, to any compunction, or kind of forbearance, in the court of Vienna, that the inactivity of Daun was owing. The reſentment of the houſe of Auſtria ſeemed, on the contrary, to glow with redoubled indignation, and the majority of the Germanick body ſeemed to enter with warmth into her quarrel.[z]

When the proteſtant ſtates in arms againſt the court of Vienna were put under the ban of the empire, the evangelical body, though without the concurrence of the Swediſh and Daniſh miniſters iſſued an arret at Ratiſbon, in the month of November of the laſt year, and to this annexed the twentieth article of the capitulation ſigned by the emperor at his election, in order to demonſtrate that the proteſtant ſtates claimed nothing but what was agreeable to the conſtitution. They declared that their aſſociation was no more than a mutual engagement, by which they obliged themſelves to adhere to the laws, without ſuffering, under any pretext, that the power of putting under the ban of the empire ſhould reſide wholly in the emperor. They affirmed that this power was renounced, in expreſs terms, by the capitulation; they, therefore, refuſed to admit, as legal, any ſentence of the ban deficient in the requiſite conditions; and inferred, that, according to law, neither the elector of Bradenburgh, nor the elector of Hanover, nor the duke of Wolfenbuttel, nor the landgrave of Heſſe, nor the count of Lippe-Buckebourg, ought to be preſcribed. The imperial proteſtant cities having acceded to this arret or declaration, the emperor, in a reſcript, required them to retract their acceſſion to the reſolution of the evangelick body; which, it muſt be owned, was altogether inconſiſtent with their former acceſſion to the reſolutions of the diet againſt the king of Pruſſia. This reſcript having produced no effect, the arret was anſwered in February by an imperial decree of commiſſion carried to the dictature, importing, that the imperial court could not longer heſitate about the execution of the ban, without infringing that very article of the capitulation which they had ſpecified: that the invalidity of the arret was manifeſt, inaſmuch as the electors of Bradenburgh and Brunſwick, the dukes of Saxe-Gotha and Brunſwick-Wolfenbuttel, and the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, were the very perſons who diſturbed the empire; this, therefore, being an affair in which they themſelves were parties, they could not poſſibly be qualified to concur in a reſolution of this nature: beſides, the number of the other ſtates which had acceded was very inconſiderable: for theſe reaſons, the emperor could not but conſider the reſolution in queſtion as an act whereby the general peace of the empire was diſturbed, both by the parties that had incurred the ban, and by the ſtates which had joined them, in order to ſupport and favour their frivolous pretenſions. His imperial majeſty expreſſed his hope and confidence, that the other electors, princes, and ſtates of the empire, would vote the ſaid reſolution to be null, and of no force; and never ſuffer ſo ſmall a number of ſtates, who were adherents of and abbettors to the diſturbers of the empire, to prejudice the rights and prerogatives of the whole Germanick body; to abuſe the name of the aſſociated eſtates of the Augſbourg confeſſion, in order forcibly to impoſe a factum, entirely repugnant to the conſtitution of the empire; to deprive their co-eſtates of the right of voting freely, and thereby endeavouring totally to ſubvert the ſyſtem of the Germanick body. Theſe remarks will ſpeak for themſelves to the reflection of the unprejudiced reader.

The implacability of the court of Vienna was equalled by nothing but the perſeverance of the French miniſtry. Though their numerous army had not gained one inch of ground in Weſtphalia, the campaign on that ſide having [z] The obſtinacy of the powers in oppoſition to Great-Britain and Pruſſia appeared ſtill more remarkable in their ſlighting the following declaration, which duke Louis of Brunſwick delivered to their miniſters at the Hague, in the month of December, after Quebeck was reduced, and the fleet of France totally defeated:

'Their Britannic and Pruſſian majeſties, moved with compaſſion at the miſchiefs which the war that has been kindled for ſome years has already occaſioned, and muſt neceſſarily produce, would think themſelves wanting to the duties of humanity, and particularly to their tender concern for the preſervation and well-being of their reſpective kingdoms and ſubjects, if they neglected the proper means to put a ſtop to the progreſs of ſo ſevere a calamity, and to contribute to the re-eſtabliſhment of public tranquility. In this view, and in order to manifeſt the purity of their intentions in this reſpect, their ſaid majeſties have determined to make the following declaration, viz.

'That they are ready to ſend plenipotentiaries to the place which ſhall be thought moſt proper, in order there to treat, conjointly, of a ſolid and general peace with thoſe whom the belligerent parties ſhall think fit to authoriſe, on their part, for the attaining ſo ſalutary an end.'

ended exactly where it had begun: though the chief ſource of their commerce in the Weſt-Indians had fallen into the hands of Great-Britain, and they had already laid their account with the loſs of Quebeck: though their coffers rung with emptineſs, and their confederates were clamorous for ſubſidies, they ſtill reſolved to maintain the war in Germany; this was doubtleſs the moſt politic reſolution to which they could adhere, becauſe their enemies, inſtead of exerting all their efforts where there was almoſt a certainty of ſucceſs, kindly condeſcended to ſeek them where alone their whole ſtrength could be advantageouſly employed, without any great augmentation of their ordinary expence. Some of the ſprings of their national wealth were indeed exhauſted, or diverted into other channels; but the ſubjects declared for a continuation of the war, and the neceſſities of the ſtate were ſupplied by the loyalty and attachment of the people. They not only acquieſced in the bankruptcy of public credit, when the court ſtopped payment of the intereſt on twelve different branches of the national debt, but they likewiſe ſent in large quantities of plate to be melted down, and coined into ſpecie, for the maintenance of the war. All the bills drawn on the government by the colonies were proteſted, to an immenſe amount, and a ſtop was put to all the annuities granted at Marſeilles on ſums borrowed for the uſe of the marine. Beſides the conſiderable ſavings occaſioned by theſe acts of ſtate bankruptcy, they had reſources of credit among the merchants of Holland, who beheld the ſucceſs of Great-Britain with an eye of jealouſy; and were moreover inflamed againſt her with the moſt rancorous reſentment, on account of the captures which had been made of their Weſt-India ſhips by the Engliſh cruiſers.

In the month of February, the merchants of Amſterdam, having received advice that the cargoes of their Weſt-India ſhips, detained by the Engliſh, would, by the Britiſh courts of judicature, be declared lawful prizes, as being French property, ſent a deputation, with a petition to the ſtates-general, entreating them to uſe their interceſſion with the court of London, repreſenting the impoſſibility of furniſhing the proofs required in ſo ſhort a time as that preſcribed by the Britiſh admiralty; and that, as the iſland of St. Euſtatia had but one road, and there was no other way of taking in cargoes but that of Overſchippen[a], to which the Engliſh had objected, a condemnation of theſe ſhips, as legal prizes, would give the finiſhing ſtroke to the trade of the colony. Whatever remonſtrances the ſtates-general might have made on this ſubject to the miniſtry of Great-Britain, they had no effect upon the proceedings of the court of admiralty, which continued to condemn the cargoes of the Dutch ſhips as often as they were proved to be French property; and this reſolute uniformity in a little time intimidated the ſubjects of Holland from perſevering in this illicit branch of commerce. The enemies of England in that republic, however, had ſo far prevailed, that in the beginning of the year the ſtates of Holland had paſſed a formal reſolution to equip 25 ſhips of war; and orders were immediately diſpatched to the officers of admiralty to complete the armament with all poſſible expedition. In the month of April, the ſtates-general ſent over to London three miniſters extraordinary, to make repreſentations, and remove, if poſſible, the cauſes of miſunderſtanding that had ariſing between Great-Britain and the United-Provinces. They delivered their credentials to the king, with a formal harangue: they ſaid his majeſty would ſee, by the contents of the letter they had the honour to preſent, how ardently their high-mightineſſes deſired to cultivate the ſincere friendſhip which had ſo long ſubſiſted between the two nations, ſo neceſſary for their common welfare and preſervation: they expreſſed an earneſt wiſh that they might be happy enough to remove thoſe difficulties which had for ſome time ſtruc at this friendſhip, and cauſed ſo much prejudice to the principal ſubjects of the republic: who, by the commerce they carried on, conſtituted its greateſt ſtrength, and chief ſupport. They declared their whole confidence was placed in his majeſty's equity, for which the republic had the higheſt regard, and in the good-will he had always expreſſed towards a ſtate, which, on all occaſions, had intereſted itſelf in promoting his glory; a ſtate which was the guardian of the precious truſt bequeathed by a princeſs ſo dear to his affection.—'Full of this confidence (ſaid they) we preſume to flatter ourſelves that your majeſty will be graciouſly pleaſed to liſten to our juſt demands; and we ſhall endeavour, during the courſe of our miniſtry, to merit your approbation, in ſtrengthening the bonds by which the two nations ought to be for ever united.' In anſwer to this oration, the king aſſured them that he had always regarded their high-mightineſſes as his beſt friends. He ſaid, if difficulties had ariſen concerning trade, they ought to be conſidered as the conſequences of a burthenſome war which he was obliged to wage with France. He deſired they would aſſure their high-mightineſſes, that he ſhould endeavour, on his part, to remove the obſtacles in queſtion, and expreſſed his ſatisfaction, that they (the deputies) were come over with the ſame diſpoſition. What repreſentations theſe deputies made, further than complaints of ſome irregularities in the conduct of the Britiſh ſea-officers, we cannot pretend to ſpecify: but as the ſubject in diſpute related entirely to the practice of the courts of judicature, it did not fall properly under the cognizance of the government, which had no right to interfere with the adminiſtration of juſtice. In all probability, the ſubjects of Holland were by no means pleaſed with the ſucceſs of this negotiation, for they murmured againſt the Engliſh nation without ceaſing. They threatened and complained by turns, and eagerly ſeized all opportunities of diſplaying their partiality in favour of the enemies of Great-Britain.

In the month of September major-general Yorke, the Britiſh miniſter at the Hague, preſented a memorial to the ſtates-general, remonſtrating, that the merchants of Holland carried on contraband trade in favour of France, by tranſporting cannon and warlike ſtores from the Baltick to Holland, in Dutch bottoms, under the borrowed names of private perſons; and then conveying them by the inland rivers and canals, or through the Dutch fortreſſes, to Dunkirk, and other places of France. He deſired that the king his maſter might be made eaſy on that head, by their putting an immediate ſtop to ſuch practices, ſo repugnant to the connections ſubſiſting by treaty between Great-Britain and the United-Provinces, as well as to every idea of neutrality. He obſerved, that the attention which his majeſty had lately given to their repreſentations againſt the exceſſes of the Engliſh privateers, by procuring an act of parliament which laid them under proper reſtrictions, gave him a good title to the ſame regard on the part of their high-mightineſſes. He reminded them that their trading towns felt the good effects of theſe reſtrictions; and that the freedom of navigation which their ſubjects enjoyed amidſt the troubles and diſtractions of Europe had conſiderably augmented their commerce. He obſerved, that ſome return ought to be made to ſuch ſolid proofs of the king's friendſhip and moderation; at leaſt, the merchants, who were ſo ready to complain of England, ought not to be countenanced in exceſſes which would have juſtified the moſt rigorous examination of their conduct. He recalled to their memories, that, during the courſe of the preſent war, the king had ſeveral times applied to their high-mightineſſes, and to their miniſters, on the liberty they had given to carry ſtores through the fortreſſes of the republic for the uſe of France, to invade the Britiſh dominions; and though his majeſty had paſſed over in ſilence many of theſe inſtances of complaiſance to his enemy, he was no leſs ſenſible of the injury; but he choſe rather to be a ſufferer himſelf, than to increaſe the embarraſſment of his neighbours, or extend the flames of war. He took notice, that even the court of Vienna had, upon more than one occaſion, employed its intereſt with their high-mightineſſes, and lent its name to obtain paſſes for warlike ſtores and proviſions for the French troops, under colour of the Barrier-Treaty, which it no longer obſerved: nay, after having put France in poſſeſſion of Oſtend and Nieuport, in manifeſt violation of that treaty, and without any regard to the rights which they and the king his maſter had acquired in that treaty, at the expence of ſo much blood and treaſure.

The memorial ſeems to have made ſome impreſſion on the ſtates-general, as they ſcrupled to allow the artillery and ſtores belonging to the French king to be removed from Amſterdam: but theſe ſcruples vaniſhed entirely on the receipt of a counter-memorial preſented by the count d'Affry, the French embaſſador, who mingled ſome effectual threats with his expoſtulation. He deſired them to remember, that, during the whole courſe of the war, the French king had required nothing from their friendſhip that was inconſiſtent with the ſtricteſt impartiality: and if he had deviated from the engagments ſubſiſting between him and the republic, it was only by granting the moſt eſſential and lucrative favours to the ſubjects of their high-mightineſſes. He obſerved that the Engliſh, notwithſtanding the insolence of their behaviour to the republic, had derived, on many occasions, assistance from the protection their effects had found in the territories of the United-Provinces; that the artillery, stores, and ammunition belonging to Wessel were deposited in their territories, which the Hanoverian army in passing the Rhine had very little respected: that when they repassed that river, they had no other way of saving their sic and wounded from the hands of the French, than by embarking them in boats, and conveying them to places where the French left them unmolested, actuated by their respect for the neutrality of the republic: that part of their magazines was still deposited in the towns of the United-Provinces; where also the enemies of France had purchased and contracted for very considerable quantities of gunpowder. He told them, that though these and several other circumstances might have been made the subject of the justest complaints, the king of France did not think it proper to require that the freedom and independency of the subjects of the republic should be restrained in branches of commerce that were not inconsistent with its neutrality, persuaded that the faith of an engagement ought to be inviolably preserved, though attended with some accidental and transient disadvantages; he gave them to understand, that the king his master had ordered the generals of his army carefully to avoid encroaching on the territory of the republic, and transferring thither the theatre of the war, when his enemies retreated that way before they were forced to pass the Rhine. After such unquestionable marks of regard, he said, his king would have the justest ground of complaint, if, contrary to expectations, he should hear that the artillery and stores belonging to him were detained at Amsterdam. Thirdly, he declared that such detention would be construed as a violation of the neutrality; and demanded, in the name of the king his master, that the artillery and stores should, without delay, be forwarded to Flanders by the canals of Amsterdam and the inland navigation. This last argument was so conclusive, that they immediately granted the necessary passports, in consequence of which the cannon were conveyed to the Austrian Netherlands.

[a] The method called Overſchippen is that of uſing French boats to load Dutch veſſels with the produce of France.

The powers in the southern parts of Europe were too much engrossed with their own concerns to interest themselves deeply in the quarrels that distracted the German empire. The king of Spain, naturally of a melancholy complexion and delicate constitution, was so deeply affected with the loss of his queen, who died in the course of the preceding year, that he renounced all company, neglected all business, and immured himself in a chamber at Villa-Viciosa, where he gave a loose to the most extravagant sorrow. He abstained from food and rest until his strength was quite exhausted. He would neither shift himself, nor allow his beard to be shaved: he rejected all attempts of consolation, and remained deaf to the most earnest and respectful remonstrances of those who had a right to render their advice. In this case, the affliction of the mind must have been re-enforced by some peculiarity in the constitution. He inherited a melancholy taint from his father, and this seems to have been dreaded as a family disease; for the infant don Louis, who likewise resided in the palace of Villa-Viciosa, was fain to amuse himself with hunting, and other divertions, to prevent his being infected with the king's disorder, which continued to gain ground, notwithstanding all the efforts of medicine. The Spanish nation, naturally superstitious, had recourse to saints and relicks; but they seemed insensible to all their devotion. The king, however, in the midst of all his distress, was prevailed upon to make his will, which was written by the count de Valparaiso, and signed by the duke de Bejar, high-chancellor of the kingdom. The exorbitancy of his grief, and the mortifications he underwent, soon produced an incurable malady, under which he languished from the month of September in the preceding year till the tenth of August in the present, when he expired. In his will he had appointed his brother don Carlos, king of Naples, successor to the crown of Spain; and nominated the queen-dowager as regent of the kingdom, until that prince should arrive. Accordingly, she assumed the reins of government, and gave directions for the funeral of the deceased king, who was interred with great pomp in the church belonging to the convent of the Visitation at Madrid.

As the death of this prince had been long expected, so the politicians of Europe had universally prognosticated that this demise would be attended with great commotions in Italy. It had been agreed among the subscribing powers to the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, that in case don Carlos should be advanced in the course of succession to the throne of Spain, his brother don Philip should succeed him on the throne of Naples; and the duchies of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla, which now constituted his establishment, should revert to the house of Austria. The king of Naples had never acceded to this article, therefore he paid no regard to it on the death of his elder brother; but retained both kingdoms, without minding the claims of the empress-queen, who, he knew, was at that time in no condition to support her pretensions. Thus the German war proved a circumstance very favourable to his interest and ambition. Before he embarked for Spain, however, he took some extraordinary steps, which evinced him a sound politician and sagacious legislator. His eldest son don Philip, who had now attained the 13th year of his age, being found in a state of incurable ideotism [b], he wisely and resolutely removed him from the succession, without any regard to the pretended right of primogeniture, by a solemn act of abdication, and the settlement of the crown of the Two Sicilies in favour of his third son, don Ferdinand. In this extraordinary act he observes, That, according to the spirit of the treaties of this age, Europe required that the sovereignty of Spain should be separated from that of Italy, when such a separation could be effected without transgressing the rules of justice: that the unfortunate prince-royal having been destitute of reason and reflection ever since his infancy, and no hope remaining that he could ever acquire the use of these faculties, he could not think of appointing him to the succession, how agreeable soever such a disposition might be to nature and his paternal affection: he was, therefore, constrained, by the divine will to set him aside, in favour of his third son, don Ferdinand, whose minority obliged him to vest the management of these realms in a regency, which he accordingly appointed, after having previously declared his son Ferdinand from that time emancipated, and freed not only from all obedience to his paternal power, but even from all submission to his supreme and sovereign authority. He then declared, that the minority of the prince succeeding to the kingdom of the Two Sicilies should expire with the 15th year of his age, when he should act as sovereign, and have the entire power of the administration. He next established and explained the order of succession in the male and female line; on condition that the monarchy of Spain should never be united with the kingdoms of the Two Sicilies. Finally, he transferred and made over to the said don Ferdinand these kingdoms, with all that he possessed in Italy; and this ordinance, signed and sealed by himself and the infant don Ferdinand, and counter-signed by the counsellors and secretaries of state, in quality of members of the regency, received all the usual forms of authenticity. Don Carlos having taken these precautions for the benefit of his third son, whom he left king of Naples, embarked with the rest of his family on board a squadron of Spanish ships, which conveyed him to Barcelona. There he landed in the month of October, and proceeded to Madrid, where, as king of Spain, he was received amidst the acclamations of his people. He began his reign, like a wise prince, by re-

[b] Abstract of the report made to his catholic majesty by the physicians appointed to examine the prince-royal, his eldest son, in consequence of which his royal highness was declared incapable of succeeding to the throne of Spain. Translated from the original, published at Naples, Sept. 27.

1. Though his royal highness don Philip is 13 years old, he is of low stature, and yet the king his father, and the queen his mother, are both of a very proper height.

2. His royal highness has some contraction in his joints, though he can readily move, and make use of them upon all occasions.

3. His royal highness is apt to stoop and to hold down his head, as people of weak eyes often do.

4. The prince most evidently squints, and his eyes frequently water and are gummy, particularly his left eye; though we cannot say he is blind, but are rather certain of the contrary, as his royal highness can without doubt distinguish object, both as to their colour and situation.

5. In his natural functions, and the most common sensations, he is sometimes indifferent to things that are convenient for him, and at other times is too warm and impetuous. In general his passions are not restrained by reason.

6. The prince has an obstinate aversion to some kind of common food, such as fruits, sweetmeats, &c.

7. All sorts of noise and sound disturb and disconcert him; and it has the same effect whether it be soft and harmonious, or harsh and disagreeable.

8. The impressions that he receives from pain or pleasure are neither strong nor lasting, and he is utterly unacquainted with all the punctilios of politeness and good breeding.

9. As to facts and places he sometimes remembers them and sometimes not; but he seems not to have the least ideas of the mysteries of our holy religion.

10. He delights in childish amusements; and those which are the most boisterous please him best. He is continually changing them, and shifting from one thing to another.

Signed by don Francis Beniore, chief physician to the king and kingdom; don Emmanuel de la Rosa, physician to the queen; and the physicians Cæsar Ciribue, don Thomas Pinto, don Francis Sarrao, and don Dominique San Severino.

gulating the interior œconomy of his kingdom; by purſuing the plan adopted by his predeceſſor; by retaining the miniſtry under whoſe auſpicies the happineſs and commerce of his people had been extended; and, with reſpect to the belligerent powers, by ſcrupulouſly adhering to that neutrality from whence theſe advantages were in a great meaſure derived.

While he ſerenely enjoyed the bleſſings of proſperity, his neighbour the king of Portugal was engroſſed by a ſpecies of employment, which, of all others, muſt be the moſt diſagreeable to a prince of ſentiment, who loves his people; namely the trial and puniſhment of thoſe conſpirators, by whoſe atrocious attempt his life had been ſo much endangered. Among theſe were numbered ſome of the firſt noblemen of the kingdom, irritated by diſappointment ambition, inflamed by bigotry, and exaſperated by revenge. The principal conſpirator, don Joſepth Maſcarenhas and Lencaſtre, duke de Aveiro, marquis of Torres Novas, and conde of Santa Cruz, was hereditary lord-ſteward of the king's houſehold, and preſident of the palace-court, or laſt tribunal of appeal in the kingdom; ſo that he poſſeſſed the firſt office at the palace, and the ſecond of the realm. Franciſco de Aſſiz, marquis of Tavora, conde of St. John and Alvor, was general of the horſe, and head of the third noble houſe of the Tavoras, the moſt illuſtrious family in the kingdom, deriving their origin from the ancient kings of Leon: he married his kinſwoman, who was marchioneſs of Tavora in her own right, and by this marriage acquired the marquiſate. Louis Bernardo de Tavora was their eldeſt ſon, who, by virtue of a diſpenſation from the pope had eſpouſed his own aunt, Donna Thereſa de Tavora. Joſeph Maria de Tovera; his youngeſt brother, was alſo involved in the guilt of his parents. The third principal concerned was don Jeronymo de Attaide, conde of Attouguia, himſelf a relation, and married to the eldeſt daughter of the marquis of Tavora. The characters of all theſe perſonages unblemiſhed and reſpectable, until this machination was detected. In the courſe of inveſtigating this dark affair, it appeared that the duke de Alveiro had conceived a perſonal hatred to the king, who had diſappointed him in a projected match between his ſon and a ſiſter of the duke de Cadaval, a minor, and prevented his obtaining ſome commanderies which the late duke de Aveiro had poſſeſſed: that this nobleman, being determined to gratify his revenge againſt the perſon of his ſovereign, had exerted all his art and addreſſes in ſecuring the participation of the mal-contents: that, with this view, he reconciled himſelf to the Jeſuits, with whom he had been formerly at variance, knowing they were at this time implacably incenſed againſt the king, who had diſmiſſed them from their office of penitentiaries at court, and branded them with other marks of diſgrace, on account of their illegal and rebellious practices in South-America: the duke, moreover, inſinuated himſelf into the confidence of the marchioneſs of Tavora, notwithſtanding an inveterate rivalſhip of pride and ambition, which had long ſubſiſted between the two families. Her reſentment againſt the king was inflamed by the mortification of her pride in repeated repulſes, when ſhe ſollicited the title of duke for her huſband. Her paſſion were artfully fomented and managed by the Jeſuits, to whom ſhe had reſigned the government of her conſcience; and they are ſaid to have perſuaded her, that it would be a meritorious action to take away the life of a prince who was an enemy to the church, and a tyrant to his people. She, being reconciled to the ſcheme of aſſaſſination, exerted her influence in ſuch a manner as to inveigle her huſband, her ſons, and ſon-in-law into the ſame infamous deſign; and yet this lady had been always remarkable for her piety, affability, and ſweetneſs of diſpoſition. Many conſultations were held by the conſpirators at the colleges of the Jeſuits, St. Antoa, and St. Roque, as well as at the houſes of the duke and the marquis. At laſt, they reſolved that the king ſhould be aſſaſſinated; and employed two ruffians, called Antonio Alvarez and Joſeph Policarpio, for the execution of this deſign, the miſcarriage of which we have related among the tranſactions of the preceding year. In the beginning of January, before the circumſtances of the conſpiracy were known, the counts de Oberas and de Ribeira Grande were impriſoned in the caſtle of St. Julian, on a ſuſpicion ariſing from their freedom of ſpeech. The ducheſs de Aveiro, the counteſs of Attouguia, and the marchioneſs of Alorna, with their children, were ſent to different nunneries; and eight Jeſuits were taken into cuſtody. A council being appointed for the trial of the priſoners, the particulars we have related were brought to light by the torture; and ſentence of death was pronounced and executed upon the convicted criminals. Eight wheels were fixed upon a ſcaffold, raiſed in the ſquare oppoſite to the houſe where the priſoners had been confined, and the 13th of January was fixed for the day of execution. Antonio Alvarez Ferreira, one of the aſſaſſins who had fired into the king's equipage, was fixed to a ſtake at one corner of the ſcaffold; and at the other was placed the effigies of his accomplice, Joſeph Policarpio de Azevedo, who had made his eſcape. The marchioneſs of Tavora, being brought upon the ſcaffold between eight and nine in the morning, was beheaded at one ſtroke, and then covered with a linen cloth. Her two ſons, and her ſon-in-law, the count of Attouguia, with three ſervants of the duke de Aveiro, were firſt ſtrangled at one ſtake, and afterwards broke upon wheels, where their bodies remained covered: but the duke and the marquis, as chiefs of the conſpiracy, were broke alive, and underwent the moſt excruciating torments. The laſt that ſuffered was the aſſaſſin Alvarez, who being condemned to be burnt alive, the combuſtibles which had been placed under the ſcaffold, were ſet on fire, the whole machine with their bodies conſumed to aſhes, and theſe aſhes thrown into the ſea. The eſtates of the three unfortunate noblemen were confiſcated, and their dwelling-houſes raſed to the ground. The name of Tavora was ſuppreſſed for ever by a public decree; but that of Maſcarenhas ſpread, becauſe the duke de Aviero was a younger branch of the family. A reward of 10,000 crowns was offered to any perſon who ſhould apprehend the aſſaſſin who had eſcaped: then the embargo was taken off the ſhipping. The king and royal family aſſiſted at a public Te Deum ſung in the chapel of Noſſa Senhora de Livramento; on which occaſion the king, for the ſatisfaction of his people, waved his handkerchief with both hands, to ſhow he was not maimed by the wounds he had received. If ſuch an attempt upon the life of a king was infamouſly cruel and perfidious, it muſt be owned that the puniſhment inflicted upon the criminals was horrible to human nature. The attempt itſelf was attended with ſome circumſtances that might have ſtaggered belief, had it not appeared but too plain that the king was actually wounded. One would imagine, that the duke de Aviero, who was charged with deſigns on the crown, would have made ſome preparations for taking advantage of the confuſion and diſorder which muſt have been produced by the king's aſſaſſination; but we do not find that any thing of this nature was premeditated. It was no more than a deſperate ſcheme of perſonal revenge, conceived without caution, and executed without conduct: a circumſtance the more extraordinary, if we ſuppoſe the conſpirators were actuated by the councils of the Jeſuits, who have been ever famous for fineſſe and dexterity. Beſides the diſcovery of all the particulars was founded upon confeſſion extorted by the rac, which, at beſt, is a ſuſpicious evidence. Be that as it will, the Portugueſe government, without waiting for a bull from the pope, ſequeſtered all the eſtates and effects of the jeſuits in that kingdom, which amounted to conſiderable ſums, and reduced the individuals of the ſociety to a very ſcanty allowance. Complaints of their conduct having been made to the pope, he appointed a congregation to examine into the affairs of the jeſuits in Portugal. In the mean time, the court of Liſbon ordered a conſiderable number of them to be embarked for Italy, and reſolved that no jeſuit ſhould hereafter reſide within its realms. When theſe tranſports arrived at Civita-Vecchia, they were, by the pope's order, lodged in the Dominican and Capuchin convents of that city, until proper houſes could be prepared for their reception at Trivoli and Freſcati. The moſt guilty of them, however, were detained in cloſe priſon in Portugal, reſerved, in all probability, for a puniſhment more adequate to their enormities.

England ſtill continued to enjoy the bleſſings of peace, even amidſt the triumphs of war. In the month of November the ſeſſion of parliament was opened by commiſſion; and, the commons attending in the houſe of peers, the lord-keeper harangued the parliament to this effect: he gave them to underſtand that his majeſty had directed him to aſſure them that he thought himſelf peculiarly happy in being able to convoke them in a ſituation of affairs ſo glorious to his crown, and advantageous to his kingdoms: that the king ſaw and devoutly adored the hand of Providence, in the many ſignal ſucceſſes both by ſea and land with which his arms had been bleſſed in the courſe of the laſt campaign: that he reflected with great ſatisfaction on the confidence which the parliament had placed in him, by making ſuch ample proviſions, and entruſting him with ſuch extenſive powers for carrying on a war, which the defence their valuable rights and poſſeſſions, together with the preſervation of the commerce of his people, had rendered both juſt and neceſſary. He enumerated the late ſucceſſes of the Britiſh arms, the reduction of Goree on the coaſt of Africa, the conqueſt of ſo many important places in America, the defeat of the French army in Canada, the reduction of their capital city of Quebeck, effected with ſo much honour to the courage and conduct of his majeſty's officers and forces, the important advantage obtained by the Britiſh ſquadron off Cape-Lagos, and the effectual blocking up for ſo many months the principal part of the French navy in their own harbours; events which muſt have filled the hearts of all his majeſty's faithful ſubjects with the ſincereſt joy: and convinced his parliament that there had been no want of vigilance or vigour on his part, in exerting thoſe means which they, with ſo much prudence and public-ſpirited zeal, had put into his majeſty's hands. He obſerved, that the national advantages had extended even as far as the Eaſt-Indies, where, by the Divine Bleſſing, the dangerous deſigns of his majeſty's enemies had miſcarried, and that valuable branch of commerce had received great benefit and protection. That the memorable victory gained over the French at Minden had long made a deep impreſſion on the minds of his majeſty's people: that if the criſis in which the battle was fought, the ſuperior number of the enemy, the great and able conduct of his majeſty's general, prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, were conſidered, that action muſt be the ſubject of laſting admiration and thankfulneſs: that if any thing could fill the breaſts of his majeſty's good ſubjects with ſtill further degrees of exultation, it would be the diſtinguiſhed and unbroken valour of the Britiſh troops, owned and applauded by thoſe whom they overcame. He ſaid the glory they had gained was not merely their own, but, in a national view, was one of the moſt important circumſtances of our ſucceſs, as it muſt be a ſtriking admonition to our enemies with whom they have to contend. He told them that his majeſty's good brother and ally, the king of Pruſſia, attacked and ſurrounded by ſo many conſiderable powers, had, by his magnanimity and abilities, and the bravery of his troops, been able, in a ſurpriſing manner, to prevent the miſchiefs concerted with ſuch united force againſt him. He declared, by the command of his ſovereign, that as his majeſty entered into this war not from views of ambition, ſo he did not wiſh to continue it from motives of reſentment: that the deſire of his majeſty's heart was to ſee a ſtop put to the effuſion of chriſtian blood: that, whenever ſuch terms of peace could be eſtabliſhed as ſhould be juſt and honourable for his majeſty and his allies; and by procuring ſuch advantages as, from the ſucceſſes of his majeſty's arms, might in reaſon and equity be expected, ſhould bring along with them full ſecurity for the future, his majeſty would rejoice to ſee the repoſe of Europe reſtored on ſuch ſolid and durable foundations; and his faithful ſubjects, to whoſe liberal ſupport and unſhaken firmneſs his majeſty owed ſo much, happy in the enjoyment of the bleſſings of peace and tranquillity: but, in order to this great and deſirable end, he ſaid his majeſty was confident the parliament would agree with him, that it was neceſſary to make ample proviſion for carrying on the war, in all parts, with the utmoſt vigour. He aſſured the commons, that the great ſupplies they had granted in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament had been faithfully employed for the purpoſes for which they were granted; but the uncommon extent of the war, and the various ſervices neceſſary to be provided for, in order to ſecure ſucceſs to his majeſty's meaſures, had unavoidably occaſioned extraordinary expences. Finally, he repeated the aſſurances from the throne of the high ſatisfaction his majeſty took in that union and good harmony which was ſo conſpicuous among his good ſubjects; he ſaid, his ſovereign was happy in ſeeing it continued and confirmed; he obſerved, that experience had ſhown how much the nation owed to this union, which alone could ſecure the true happineſs of his people.

We ſhall not anticipate the reader's own reflection, by pretending to comment upon either the matter or the form of this harangue, which, however, produced all the effect which the ſovereign could deſire. The houſes, in their reſpective addreſſes, ſeemed to vie with each other in expreſſions of attachment and complacency. The peers profeſſed their utmoſt readineſs to concur in the effectual ſupport of ſuch further meaſures as his majeſty, in his great wiſdom, ſhould judge neceſſary or expedient for carrying on the war with vigour, in all parts, and for diſappointing and repelling any deſperate attempts which might be made upon theſe kingdoms. The commons expreſſed their admiration of that true greatneſs of mind which diſpoſed his majeſty's heart, in the midſt of proſperities, to wiſh a ſtop put to the effuſion of chriſtian blood, and to ſee tranquillity reſtored. They declared their entire reliance on his majeſty's known wiſdom and firmneſs, that this deſirable object, whenever it ſhould be obtained would be upon terms juſt and honourable for his majeſty and his allies; and, in order to effect that great end, they aſſured him they would chearfully grant ſuch ſupplies as ſhould be found neceſſary to ſuſtain, and preſs with effect, all his extenſive operations againſt the enemy. They did not fail to re-echo the ſpeech, as uſual, enumerating the trophies of the year, and extolling the king of Pruſſia for his conſummate genius, magnanimity, unwearied activity, and unſhaken conſtancy of mind. Very great reaſon, indeed, had his majeſty to be ſatisfied with an addreſs of ſuch a nature from a houſe of commons, in which oppoſition lay ſtrangled at the foot of the miniſter; in which thoſe demagogues, who had raiſed themſelves to reputation and renown, by declaiming againſt continental meaſures, were become ſo perfectly reconciled to the object of their former reprobation, as to cultivate it even with a degree of enthuſiaſm unknown to any former adminiſtration, and lay the nation under ſuch contributions in its behalf as no other miniſtry durſt ever meditate. Thus diſpoſed, it was no wonder they admired the moderation of their ſovereign, in offering to treat of peace, after above a million of men had periſhed by the war, and twice that number been reduced to miſery; after whole provinces had been depopulated, whole countries ſubdued, and the victors themſelves almoſt cruſhed by the trophies they had gained.

Immediately after the addreſſes were preſented, the commons reſolved themſelves into a committee of the whole houſe, and having unanimouſly voted a ſupply to his majeſty, began to take the particulars into conſideration. This committee was continued till the 12th of May, when that whole buſineſs was accompliſhed. For the ſervice of the enſuing year they voted 70,000 ſeamen including 18,355 marines; and for their maintenance allotted 3,640,000l. The number of land-forces, including the Britiſh troops in Germany, and the invalids, they fixed at 57,294 men, and granted for their ſubſiſtence 1,383,748l. 10d. For maintaining other forces in the plantations, Gibraltar, Guadaloupe, Africa, and the Eaſt-Indies, they allowed 846,168l. 19s.: for the expence of four regiments on the Iriſh eſtabliſhment, ſerving in North-America, they voted 35,744l. 8s. 4d. For pay to the general and general ſtaff-officers, and officers of the hoſpital for the land-forces, they aſſigned 54,454l. 11s. 9d. They voted for the expence of the militia in South and North-Britain the ſum of 102,061. 4s. 8d. They granted for the maintenance of 38,750 men, being the troops of Hanover, Wolfenbuttel, Saxe-Gotha and Buckebourg, retained in the ſervice of Great-Britain, the ſum of 447,882l. 10s. 5½d.; and for 19,000 Heſſian troops in the ſame pay, they gave 366,725l. 1s. 6d. They afterwards beſtowed the ſum of 108,012l. 12s. 7d. for defraying the additional expence of augmentations in the troops of Hanover and Heſſe, and the Britiſh army ſerving in the empire. For the ordinary of the navy, including half-pay to ſea-officers; for carrying on the building of two hoſpitals, one near Goſport, and the other in the neighbourhood of Plymouth: for the ſupport of the hoſpital at Greenwich; for purchaſing ground, erecting wharfs, and other accommodations neceſſary for refitting the fleets at Halifax, in Nova-Scotia: for the charge of the office of ordnance, and defraying the extraordinary expence incurred by that office in the courſe of the laſt year, they allowed 781,489l. 6s. 6d. Towards paying off the navy debt, building, re-buildings, and repairs of the king's ſhips, together with the charge of tranſport-ſervice, they granted 1,701,078l. 16s. 6d. For defraying the extraordinary expences of the land-forces, and other ſervices not provided for by parliament, comprehending the penſions for the widows of reduced officers, they allotted the ſum of 955,344l. 15s. 5½d. They voted one million, to empower his majeſty to diſcharge the like ſum, raiſed in purſuance of an act made in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, and charged upon the firſt aids or ſupplies to be granted in this ſeſſion of parliament. They gave 670,000l. for enabling his majeſty to make good his engagements with the king of Pruſſia, purſuant to a new convention between him and that monarch, concluded on the 9th day of November in the preſent year. Fifteen thouſand pounds they allowed, upon account, towards enabling the principal officers of his majeſty's ordnance to defray the neceſſary charges and expences of taking down and removing the preſent magazine for gunpowder, ſituated in the neighbourhood of Greenwich, and of erecting it in ſome leſs dangerous ſitua-

tion. Sixty thouſand pounds they gave, to enable his majeſty to fulfil his engagements with the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, purſuant to the ſeparate article of a treaty between the two powers, renewed in the month of November; the ſum to be paid as his moſt ſerene highneſs ſhould think it moſt convenient, in order to faciliate the means by which the landgrave might again fix his reſidence in his own dominions, and by his preſence give freſh courage to his faithful ſubjects. Five hundred thouſand pounds they voted upon account, as a preſent ſupply towards defraying the charges of forage, bread, bread-waggons, train of artillery, wood, ſtraw, proviſions, and contingences of his majeſty's combined army under the command of prince Ferdinand. To the Foundling-hoſpital they granted 5000l.; and 15,000l. for improving, widening, and enlarging the paſſage over and through London-bridge. To replace divers ſums taken from the ſinking-fund, they granted 225,281l. 19s. 4d. For the ſubſiſtence of reduced officers, including the allowances to the ſeveral officers and private men of the two troops of horſe-guards and regiment of horſe reduced, and to the ſuperannuated gentlemen of the four troops of horſe-guards, they voted 38,597l. 9s. Upon occount, for the ſupport of the colonies of Nova-Scotia and Georgia, they granted 21,694l. 2s. 2d. For enabling the king to give a proper compenſation to the provinces in North-America for the expences they might incur in levying and maintaining troops, according as the vigour and activity of thoſe reſpective provinces ſhould be thought by his majeſty to merit. They advanced the ſum of 200,000l. The Eaſt-India company they gratified with 20,000l. towards enabling them to defray the expence of a military force in their ſettlements, in lieu of a battalion of the king's troops now returned to Ireland. Twenty-five thouſand pounds were provided for the payment of the out-penſioners of Chelſea-hoſpital. For ſubſequent augmentations of the Britiſh forces, ſince the firſt eſtimate of guards and garriſons for the enſuing year was preſented, they allowed 134,139l. 17s. 4d. They further voted, upon account, towards enabling the governors and guardians of the Foundling-hoſpital to maintain, educate, and bind apprentice the children admitted into the ſaid charity, the ſum of 47,285l. For defraying the expence of maintaining the militia in South and North-Britain, to the 24th day of December of the enſuing year, they voted an additional grant of 290,826l. 16s. 8d.; and moreover, they granted 80,000l. upon account, towards defraying the charge of pay and clothing of the unembodied militia for the year, ending on the 25th day of March 1761. For reemburſing the colony of New-York their expences in furniſhing proviſions and ſtores to the troops raiſed by them for his majeſty's ſervice, in the campaign of the year 1756, they allowed 2,977l. 7s. 8d.; and for maintaining the Britiſh forts and ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa they renewed the grant of 10,000l. For maintenance and augmentation of the troops of Brunſwick in the pay of Great-Britain for the enſuing year, purſuant to an ulterior convention concluded and ſigned at Paderborn, on the 5th day of March, in the year 1760, they granted the ſum of 90,769l. 8s. 11¼d.; and for the troops of Heſſe-Caſſel in the ſame pay, during the ſame period, they allotted 101,096l. 3s. 2d. For the extraordinary expences of the land-forces, and other ſervices incurred from the 24th day of November in the preſent year to the 24th of December following, and not provided for, they granted the ſum of 420,120l. 1s. To make good the deficiency of the grants for the ſervice of the year 1759 they aſſigned the ſum of 75,170l. 3¼d. For printing the journals of the houſe of commons they gave 5000l.; and 634l. 13s. 7d. as intereſt, at the rate of four per cent. per ann. from the 25th day of Auguſt in the preſent year, to the ſame day of April next, for the ſum of 23,800l. 11s. 11d. remaining in the office of ordnance, and not paid into the hands of the deputy of the king's remembrancer of the court of Exchequer, as directed by an act made in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament; to make compenſation for lands and hereditaments purchaſed for his majeſty's ſervice at Chatham, Portſmouth, and Plymouth, by reaſon of doubts and difficulties which had ariſen touching the execution of the ſaid act. For defraying the extraornninary charge of the Mint, during the preſent year, they allowed 11,940l. 13s. 10d. and 2500l. upon account, for paying the debts claimed and ſuſtained upon a forfeited eſtate in North-Britain. They likewiſe allowed 12,874l. 15s. 10d. for defraying the charge of a regiment of light dragoons, and of an additional company to the corps commanded by lieutenant-colonal Vaughan. Finally, they voted one million upon account, to enable the king to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred or to be incurred for the ſervice of the year 1760; and to take all ſuch meaſures as might be neceſſary to defeat any enterprize or deſigns of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs might require. On the whole, the ſum total granted in this ſeſſion of parliament amounted to 15,503,563l. 15s. 9½d.: a ſum ſo enormous, whether we conſider the nation that raiſed it, or the purpoſes for which it was raiſed, that every Britain of a ſedate mind, attached to the intereſt and welfare of his country, muſt reflect upon it with equal aſtoniſhment and concern; a ſum conſiderably more then double the largeſt ſubſidy that was granted in the reign of queen Anne, when the nation was in the zenith of her glory, and retained half the powers of Europe in her pay; a ſum near double of what any former adminiſtration durſt have aſked; and near double of what the moſt ſanguine calculators who lived in the beginning of this century thought the nation could give without the moſt eminent hazard of immediate bankruptcy. Of the immenſe ſupply which we have particulariſed, the reader will perceive that 2,344,486l. 16s. 7½d. were paid to foreigners for ſupporting the war in Germany, excluſive of the money expended by the Britiſh troops in that country, the number of which amounted, in the courſe of the enſuing year, to 20,000 men; a number the more extraordinary, if we conſider they were all tranſported to that continent during the adminiſtration of thoſe who declared in parliament (the words ſtill ſounding in our ears) that not a man, nor even half a man, ſhould be ſent from Great-Britain to Germany, to fight the battles of any foreign elector. Into the expence of the German war ſuſtained by Great-Britain we muſt alſo throw the charge of tranſporting the Engliſh troops, the article of forage, which alone amounted, in the courſe of the laſt campaign, to 1,200,000l. beſides pontage, waggons, horſes, and many other contigences. To the German war we may alſo impute the extraordinary expence incurred by the actual ſervice of the militia, which the abſence of the regular troops rendered in a great meaſure neceſſary; and the loſs of ſo many hands withdrawn from induſtry, from huſbandry, and manufacture. The loſs ſuſtained by this connexion was equally grievous and apparent; the advantage accruing from it, either to Britain or Hanover, we have not diſcernment ſufficient to perceive, conſequently cannot be ſuppoſed able to explain.

The committee of ways and means, having duely deliberated on the articles of ſupply, continued ſitting from the 22d day of November to the 14th of May, during which period they eſtabliſhed the neceſſary funds to produce the ſums which had been granted. The land-tax at 4s. in the pound, and the malt-tax, were continued, as the ſtanding revenue of Great-Britain. The whole proviſion made by the committee of ways and means amounted to 16,130,561l. 9s. 8d. exceeding the grants for the ſervice of the year 1760 in the ſum of 626,997l. 13s. 10½d. This exceſs, however, will not appear extraordinary, when we conſider, that it was deſtined to make good the premium of 240,000l. to the ſubſcribers upon the eight million loan, as well as the deficiencies in the other grants, which never fail to make a conſiderable article in the ſupply of every ſeſſion. That theſe gigantic ſtrides towards the ruin of public credit were ſuch as might alarm every well-wiſher to his country, will perhaps, more plainly appear in the ſum total of the national debt, which including the incumbrance of one million charged upon the civil-liſt revenue, and provided for by a tax upon ſalaries and penſions payable out of that revenue, amounted, at this period, to the tremendous ſum of 108,493,154l. 14s. 11¼d. A comfortable reflection this to a people involved in the moſt expenſive war that ever was waged, and already burthened with ſuch taxes as no other nation ever bore.

It is not at all neceſſary to particulariſe the acts that were founded upon the reſolutions touching the ſupply. We ſhall only obſerve that in the act for the land-tax, and in the act for the malt-tax, there was a clauſe of credit, empowering the commiſſioners of the treaſury to raiſe the money which they produced by loanes on exchequer-bills, bearing an intereſt of four per cent. per annum, that is, one per cent. higher than the intereſt uſually granted in time of peace. While the houſe of commons deliberated on the bill for granting to his majeſty ſeveral duties upon malt, and for raiſing a certain ſum of money to be charged on the ſaid duties, a petition was preſented by the maltſters of Ipſwich and parts adjacent againſt an additional duty on the ſtoc of malt in hand: but no regard was paid to this remonſtrance: and the bill, with ſeveral new amendments, paſſed through both houſes, under the title of 'An act for granting to his majeſty ſeveral duties upon malt, and for raiſing the ſum of eight millions by way of annuities and a lottery, to be charged on the ſaid duties; and to prevent the fraudulent obtaining of allowances in the gauging of corn making into malt; and for making forth duplicates of exchequer-bills, tickets, certificates, receipts, annuity-orders, and other orders loſt, burned or otherwiſe deſtroyed.' The other three bills that turned wholly on the ſupply were paſſed in common courſe, without the leaſt oppoſition in either houſe, and received the royal aſſent by commiſſion, at the end of the ſeſſion. The firſt of theſe intituled, 'A bill for enabling his majeſty to raiſe a certain ſome of money for the uſes and purpoſes therein mentioned,' contained a clauſe of approbation, added to it by inſtruction: and the bank was enabled to lend the million which the commiſſioners of the treaſury were empowered by the act to borrow, at the intereſt of 4l. per cent. The ſecond, granting to his majeſty a certain ſum of money out of the ſinking-fund, for the ſervice of the year 1760, comprehended a clauſe of credit for borrowing the money thereby granted; and another clauſe, empowering the bank to lend it without any limitation of intereſt; and the third enabling his majeſty to raiſe a certain ſum of money towards diſcharging the debt of the navy, and for naval ſervices during the enſuing year, enacted, that the exchequer-bills thereby to be iſſued ſhould not be received, or paſs to any receiver or collector of the public revenue, or at the receipt of the exchequer, before the 26th day of March in the year 1761.

As the act of the preceding ſeſſion, prohibiting the malt-diſtillery, was to expire at Chriſtmas, the commons, thinking it neceſſary to conſider of proper methods for laying the malt-diſtillery under ſuch regulations as might prevent, if poſſible, its being prejudicial to the health and morals of the people, began as early as the month of November to deliberate on this affair; which being under agitation, petitions were preſented to the houſe by ſeveral of the principal inhabitants of Spitalfields; the mayor and commonalty of New Sarum; the gentlemen, clergy, merchants, manufacturers, tradeſmen, and other inhabitants of Colcheſter; the mayor, aldermen, and common-council of King's Lynn in Norfolk; the mayor and baliffs of Berwick-upon-Tweed; repreſenting the advantages accruing from the prohibition of the malt-diſtillery, and praying the continuance of the act by which it was prohibited. On the other hand, counter-petitions were offered by the mayor, magiſtrates, merchants, manufacturers, and other gentlemen of the city of Norwich; by the land-owners and holders of the ſouth-weſt part of Eſſex; and by the freeholders of the ſhires of Roſs and Cromartie, in North-Britain; alledging, that the ſcarcity of corn, which had made it neceſſary to prohibit the malt-diſtillery, had ceaſed; and that the continuing the prohibition beyond the neceſſity which had required it would be a great loſs and diſcouragement to the landed intereſt; they, therefore prayed that the ſaid diſtillery might be again opened, under ſuch regulations and reſtrictions as the houſe ſhould think proper. Theſe remonſtrances being taken into conſideration, and divers accounts peruſed, the houſe unanimouſly agreed that the prohibition ſhould be continued for a limited time; and a bill being brought in, purſuant to this reſolution, paſſed through both houſes, and received the royal aſſent; by which means the prohibition of the malt-diſtillery was continued till the 24th day of December in the year 1760, unleſs ſuch continuation ſhould be abridged by any other act to be paſſed in the preſent ſeſſion.

The committee, having examined a great number of accounts and papers relating to ſpirituous liquors, agreed to four reſolutions, importing, that the preſent high price of ſpirituous liquors is a principal cauſe of the diminution in the home-conſumption thereof, and hath greatly contributed to the health, ſobriety, and induſtry of the common people: that, in order to continue for the future the preſent high price of all ſpirits uſed for home-conſumption, a large additional duty ſhould be laid upon all ſpirituous liquors whatſoever diſtilled within or imported into Great-Britain: that there ſhould be a drawbac of the ſaid additional duties upon all ſpirituous liquors diſtilled in Great-Britain, which ſhould be exported; and that an additional bounty ſhould be granted, under proper regulations, upon the exportation of all ſpirituous liquors drawn from corn in Great-Britain. A great many accounts being puruſed, and witneſſes examined, relating to the diſtillery, a bill was brought in, to prevent the exceſſive uſe of ſpirituous liquors, by laying an additional duty thereupon; and to encourage the exportation of Britiſh-made ſpirits. Conſiderable oppoſition was made to the bill, on the opinion that the additional duty propoſed was too ſmall; and that, among the reſolutions, there was not ſo much as one that looked like a proviſion or reſtriction for preventing the pernicious abuſe of ſuch liquors. Nay, many perſons affirmed, that what was propoſed looked more like a ſcheme for increaſing the public revenues, than a ſalutary meaſure to prevent exceſs. The merchants and manufacturers of the town of Birmingham petitioned for ſuch reſtrictions. The lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London preſented a petition by the hands of the two ſheriffs, ſetting forth, that the petitioners had, with great pleaſure, obſerved the happy conſequences produced upon the morals, behaviour, induſtry, and health of the lower claſs of people, ſince the prohibition of the malt diſtillery: that the petitioners, having obſerved a bill was brought in to allow the diſtilling of ſpirits from corn, were apprehenſive that the encouragement given to the diſtillers thereof would prove detrimental to the commercial intereſts of the nation; and they conceived the advantages propoſed to be allowed upon the exportation of ſuch ſpirits, being ſo much above the value of their commodity, would lay ſuch a temptation for ſmuggling and purjury as no law could prevent. They expreſſed their fears, that, ſhould ſuch a bill paſs into a law, the exceſſive uſe of ſpirituous liquors would not only debilitate and enervate the labourers, manufacturers, ſailors, ſoldiers, and all the lower claſs of people, and thereby extinguiſh induſtry, and that remarkable intrepidity which had lately ſo eminently appeared in the Britiſh nation, which muſt always depend on the vigour and induſtry of its people; but alſo its liberty and happineſs, which cannot be ſupported without temperance and morality, would run the utmoſt riſque of being deſtroyed. They declared themſelves alſo apprehenſive, that the extraordinary conſumption of bread corn by the ſtill would not only raiſe the price, ſo as oppreſs the lower claſs of people; but would raiſe ſuch a bar to the exportation thereof, as to deprive the nation of a great influx of money, at that time eſſential towards the maintaining of an expenſive war, and therefore highly injure the landed and commercial intereſt: they, therefore, prayed that the preſent prohibition of diſtilling ſpirits from corn might be continued, or that the uſe of wheat might not be allowed in diſtillation. This remonſtrance was corroborated by another, to the ſame purpoſe, from ſeveral merchants, manufacturers, and traders reſiding in and near the city of London; and ſeemed to have ſome weight with the commons, who made ſeveral amendments in the bill, which they now intituled, 'A bill for preventing the exceſſive uſe of ſpirituous liquors, by laying additional duties thereon; for ſhortening the prohibition for making low wines and ſpirits from wheat; for encouraging the exportation of Britiſh-made ſpirits, and preventing the fraudulent relanding or importation thereof.' Thus altered and amended, it paſſed on a diviſion; and, making its way through the houſe of lords, acquired the royal ſanction. Whether the law be adequate to the purpoſes for which it was enacted time will determine. The beſt way of preventing the exceſs of ſpirituous liquors would be to lower the exciſe on beer and ale, ſo as to enable the poorer claſs of labourers to refreſh themſelves with comfortable liquor for nearly the ſame expence that will procure a quantity of Geneva ſufficient for intoxication; for it cannot be ſuppoſed that a poor wretch will expend his laſt penny upon a draft of ſmall beer, without ſtrength, or the leaſt ſatisfactory operation, when for the half of that ſum he can purchaſe a cordial, that will almoſt inſtantaneouſly allay the ſenſe of hunger and cold, and regale his imagination with the moſt agreeable illuſions. Malt was at this time ſold cheaper than it was in the firſt year of king James I. when the parliament enacted, that no innkeeper, victualler, or alehouſe-keeper, ſhould ſell leſs than a full quart of the beſt ale or beer, or two quarts of the ſmall for 1d. under the penalty of 20s. It appears, then, that in the reign of king James the ſubject paid but 4d. for a gallon of ſtrong beer, which now coſt 1s.; and as the malt is not increaſed in value, the difference in the price muſt be entirely owing to the taxes on beer, malt, and hops, which are indeed very grieveous, though perhaps neceſſary. The duty on ſmall beer is certainly one of the heavieſt taxes impoſed upon any ſort of conſumption that cannot be conſidered as an article of luxury. Two buſhels of malt, and two pounds of hops, are required to make a barrel of good ſmall beer, which was formerly ſold for 6s.; and the taxes payable on ſuch a barrel amounted to 3s. 6d.; ſo that the ſum total of the impoſition on this commodity was equal to a land-tax of 11s. 8d. in the pound.

Immediately after the reſolution relating to the prohibition of ſpirits from wheat, a motion was made, and leave given, to bring in a bill to continue, for a time limited, the act of the laſt ſeſſion, permitting the importation of ſalted beef from Ireland. This permiſſion was accordingly extended to the 24th day of December, in the year 1761. In all probability this ſhort and temporary continuance was propoſed by the favourers of the bill, in order to avoid the clamour and oppoſition of prejudice and ignorance, which would have been dangerouſly alarmed, had it been rendered perpetual. Yet, as undoubted evidence had proved before the committee, while the bill was depending, that the importation had been of great ſervice to England, particularly in reducing the price of ſalted beef for the uſe of the navy, perhaps no conſideration ought to have prevented the legiſlature from perpetuating the law; a meaſure that would encourage the graſiers of Ireland to breed and fatten horned cattle, and certainly put a ſtop to the practice of exporting ſalted beef from that kingdom to France, which undoubtedly furniſhes the traders of that kingdom with opportunities of exporting wool to the ſame country.

As ſeveral lieutenants of counties had, for various reaſons, ſuſpended all proceedings in the execution of the laws relating to the militia for limited times, which ſuſpenſions were deemed inconſiſtent with the intent of the legiſlature, a bill was now brought in, to enable his majeſty's lieutenants of the ſeveral counties of England and Wales to proceed in the execution of the militia laws, notwithſtanding any adjournments. It was enacted, that, as the ſpeedy execution of the laws for regulating the militia was moſt eſſentially neceſſary at this juncture to the peace and ſecurity of the kingdom, every lieutenant of the place where ſuch ſuſpenſion had happened ſhould, within one month after the paſſing of this act, proceed as if there had been no ſuſpenſion; and ſummon a meeting for the ſame purpoſe once in every ſucceeding month, until a ſufficient number of officers, qualified and willing to ſerve, ſhould be found, or until the expiration of the act for the better ordering the militia forces. The eſtabliſhment of a regular militia in South-Britain could not fail to make an impreſſion upon the patriots of Scotland. They were convinced, from reaſon and experience, that nothing could more tend to the peace and ſecurity of their country than ſuch an eſtabliſhment in North-Britain, the inhabitants of which had been peculiarly expoſed to inſurrections, which a well-regulated militia might have prevented, or ſtifled in the birth; and their coaſt had been lately alarmed by a threatened invaſion, which nothing but the want of ſuch an eſtabliſhment had rendered formidable to the natives. They thought themſelves entitled to the ſame ſecurity which the legiſlature had provided for their fellow-ſubjects, in South-Britain, and could not help being uneaſy at the proſpect of ſeeing themſelves left unarmed, and expoſed to injuries both foreign and domeſtic, while the ſword was put in the hands of their ſouthern neighbours. Some of the members who repreſented North-Britain in parliament, moved by theſe conſiderations, as well as by the earneſt injunctions of their conſtituents, reſolved to make a vigorous effort, in order to obtain the eſtabliſhment of a regular militia in Scotland. In the beginning of March it was moved, and reſolved, that the houſe would, on the 12th day of the month, reſolve itſelf into a committee, to conſider of the laws in being which relate to the militia in that part of Great-Britain called Scotland. The reſult of that enquiry was, that theſe laws were ineffectual. Then a motion was made for leave to bring in a bill for the better ordering of the militia forces in North-Britain, and though it met with great oppoſition, was carried by a large majority. The principal Scottiſh members of the houſe were appointed, in conjunction with others, to prepare the bill, which was ſoon printed, and re-enforced by petitions preſented by the gentlemen, juſtices of the peace, and commiſſioners of the ſupply for the ſhire of Ayr; and by the freeholders of the ſhires of Edinburgh, Stirling, Perth, and Forfar. They expreſſed their approbation of the eſtabliſhed militia in England, and their ardent wiſh to ſee the benefit of that wiſe and ſalutary meaſure extended to North-Britain. This was an indulgence they had the greater reaſon to hope for, as by the articles of the Union they were undoubtedly entitled to be on the ſame footing with their brethren of England, and as the legiſlature muſt now be convinced of the neceſſity of ſome ſuch meaſure, by the conſternation lately produced in their defenceleſs country, from the threatened invaſion of a handful of French freebooters. Theſe remonſtrances had no weight with the majority in the houſe of commons, who, either unable or unwilling to make proper diſtinctions between the ill and well-affected ſubjects of North-Britain, rejected the bill, as a very dangerous experiment in favour of a people among whom ſo many rebellions had been generated and produced. When the motion was made for the bill's being committed, a warm debate enſued, in the courſe of which many Scottiſh members ſpoke in behalf of their country with great force of argument, and a very laudable ſpirit of freedom. Mr Elliot, in particular, one of the commiſſioners of the board of admiralty, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a noble flow of eloquence adorned with all the graces of oratory, and warmed with the true ſpirit of patriotiſm. Mr Oſwald, of the treaſury, acquitted himſelf with great honour on the occaſion; ever nervous, ſteady, and ſagacious, independent though in office, and invariable in purſuing the intereſt of his country. It muſt be owned, for the honour of North-Britain, that all her repreſentatives, except two, warmly contended for this national meaſure, which was carried in the negative by a majority of 106, though the bill was exactly modelled by the late act of parliament for the eſtabliſhment of the militia in England.

Even this inſtitution, though certainly laudable and neceſſary, was attended with ſo many unforeſeen difficulties, that every ſeſſion of parliament ſince it was firſt eſtabliſhed has produced new acts for its better regulation. In April, leave was given to prepare a bill for limiting, confining, and better regulating the payment of the weekly allowances made by act of parliament for the maintenance of families unable to ſupport themſelves during the abſence of militia-men embodied, and ordered out into actual ſervice; as well as for amending and improving the eſtabliſhment of the militia, and leſſening the number of officers entitled to pay within that part of Great-Britain called England. While this bill was under conſideration, the houſe received a petiton from the mayor, aldermen, town-clerk, ſheriffs, gentlemen, merchants, clergy, tradeſmen, and others, inhabitants of the ancient city of Lincoln, repreſenting, That by an act paſſed relating to the militia, it was provided, that when any militia-men ſhould be ordered out into actual ſervice, leaving families unable to ſupport themſelves during their abſence, the overſeers of the pariſh where ſuch families reſide ſhould allow them ſuch weekly ſupport as ſhould be preſcribed by any one juſtice of the peace, which allowance ſhould be re-emburſed out of the county ſtoc. They alledged, that a conſiderable number of men, inhabitants of the ſaid city, had entered themſelves to ſerve in the militia of the county of Lincoln, as volunteers, for ſeveral pariſhes and perſons; yet their families were, nevertheleſs, ſupported by the county ſtoc of the city and county of the city of Lincoln. They took notice of the bill under deliberation, and prayed, that if it ſhould paſs into a law they might have ſuch relief in the premiſſes, as to the houſe ſhould ſeem meet. Regard was had to this petition in the amendments to the bill[c], which paſſed through both houſes, and ſoon after received the royal aſſent by commiſſion. During the dependance of this bill, another was brought in, to explain ſo much of the militia act paſſed in the 31ſt year of his majeſty's reign as related to the money to be given to private militia-men, upon their being ordered out into actual ſervice. By this law it was enacted, that the guinea, which by the former act was due to every private man of every regiment or company of militia, when ordered out into actual ſervice, ſhould be paid to every man that ſhall afterwards be enrolled into ſuch regiment or company whilſt in actual ſervice; that no man ſhould be intitled to his clothes for his own uſe until he ſhould have ſerved three years, if unembodied, or one year, if embodied, after the delivery of the clothes; and that the full pay of the militia ſhould commence from the date of his majeſty's warrant for drawing them out. The difficulties which theſe ſucceſſive regulation were made to obviate will be amply recompenſed by the good effects of a national militia, provided it be employed in a national way, and for national purpoſes: but if the militia are embodied, and the different regiments that compoſe it are marched from the reſpective counties to which they belong; if the men are detained for any length of time in actual ſervice, at a diſtance from their families, when they might be employed at home in works of induſtry, for the ſupport of their natural dependants, the militia becomes no other than an addition to, or augmentation of a ſtanding army, inliſted for the term of three years. The labour of the men is loſt to the community; they contract the idle habits and diſſolute manners of the other troops; their families are left as incumbrances on the community, and the charge of their ſubſiſtence is, at leaſt, as heavy as that of maintaining an equal number of regular forces. It would not, we apprehend, be very eaſy to account for the government's ordering the regiments of militia to march from their reſpective counties, and to do duty for a conſiderable length of time at a great diſtance from their own homes, unleſs we ſuppoſe this meaſure was taken to create in the people a diſguſt to the inſtitution of the militia, which was an eſtabliſhment extorted from the ſecretary by the voice of the nation. We may add, that ſome of the inconveniences attending a militia will never be totally removed while the perſons drawn by lot for that ſervice are at liberty to hire ſubſtitutes; for it cannot be ſuppoſed that men of ſubſtance will incur the danger, fatigue, and damage of ſerving in perſon, while they can hire among the loweſt claſs of people mercenaries of deſperate fortune and abandoned morals, who will greedily ſeize the opportunity of being paid for renouncing that labour by which they were before obliged to maintain themſelves and their family connexion: it would, therefore, deſerve the conſideration of the legiſlature, whether the privilege of hiring ſubſtitutes ſhould not be limited to certain claſſes of men, who are either raiſed by their rank in life above the neceſſity of ſerving in perſon, or engaged in ſuch occupations as cannot be intermitted without prejudice to the common-wealth. It muſt be allowed, that the regulation in this new act, by which the families of ſubſtitutes are deprived of any relief from the pariſh, will not only diminiſh the burthen of the poor's rates; but alſo, by raiſing the price of mercenaries, oblige a greater number of the better ſort to ſerve in perſon. Without all doubt, the fewer ſubſtitutes that are employed, the more dependence may be placed upon the militia in the preſervation of our rights and privileges, and the more will the number of the diſciplined men be increaſed, becauſe, at the expiration of every three years, the lot-men muſt be changed, and new militia-men choſen; but the ſubſtitutes will, in all probability, continue for life in the ſervice, provided they can find lot-men to hire them at every rotation. The reader will forgive our being ſo circumſtantial upon the regulations of an inſtitution which we cannot help regarding with a kind of enthuſiaſtic affection.

[c] By this law it was enacted, that if any militia-man who ſhall have been accepted and enrolled as a ſubſtitute, hired man, or volunteer, before the paſſing of the act, or who ſhall have been choſen by lot, whether before or after the paſſing of the act, ſhall, when embodied, or called out into actual ſervice, and ordered to march, leave a family unable to ſupport themſelves, the overſeers ſhall, by order of ſome one juſtice of the peace, pay, out of the poor's rates of ſuch pariſh, a weekly allowance to ſuch family, according to the uſual and ordinary price of labour and huſbandry there; viz. for one child under the age of ten years the price of one day's labour: for two children under the age aforeſaid the price of two days labour; for three or four children under the age aforeſaid the price of three days labour; for five or more children under the age aforeſaid the price of four day's labour; and for the wife of ſuch militia-man the price of one day's labour; but that the families of ſuch men only as ſhould be choſen by lot, and of the ſubſtitutes, hired men, and volunteers, already accepted and enrolled, ſhall, after the paſſing of this act, receive any ſuch weekly allowance. For removing the grievance complained of in the above petition, it is enacted, that were treaſurers ſhall re-emburſe to overſeers any money, in purſuance of this act, on account of the weekly allowance to the family of any militia-man ſerving in the militia of any county or place other than that wherein ſuch family ſhall dwell, they are to tranſmit an account thereof, ſigned by ſome juſtice for the place where ſuch family ſhall dwell, to the treaſurer of the county, &c. in the militia whereof ſuch militia-man ſhall ſerve, who is thereupon to pay him the ſums ſo re-emburſed to ſuch overſeers, and the ſame to be allowed in his accounts.

In the latter end of November the houſe of commons received a petition from ſeveral noblemen, gentlemen, and others, inhabitants of Eaſt-Greenwich, and places adjacent, in Kent, repreſenting, that in the ſaid pariſh, within a quarter of a mile of the town diſtinguiſhed by a royal palace, and royal hoſpital for ſeamen, there was a magazine, containing great quantities of gunpowder, frequently to the amount of 6000 barrels: that, beſides the great danger which muſt attend all places of that kind, the ſaid magazine ſtood in an open field, unencloſed by any fortification or defence whatſoever, conſequently expoſed to treachery, and every other accident. They alledged, that if, through treachery, lightning, or any other accident, this magazine ſhould take fire, not only their lives and properties, but the palace and hoſpital, the king's yards and ſtores at Deptford and Woolwich, the banks and navigation of the Thames, with the ſhips ſailing and at anchor in that river, would be inevitably deſtroyed, and inconceivable damage would accrue to the cities of London and Weſtminſter. They, moreover, obſerved that the magazine was then in a dangerous condition, ſupported on all ſides by props that were decayed at the foundation; that in caſe it ſhould fall, the powder would, in all probability, take fire, and produce the dreadful calamities above recited: they, therefore, prayed that the magazine might be removed to ſome more convenient place, where any accident would not be attended with ſuch diſmal conſequences. The ſubject of this remonſtrance was ſo preſſing and important, that a committee was immediately appointed to take the affair into conſideration, and procure an eſtimate for purchaſing lands, and erecting a powder-magazine, at Purfleet, in Eſſex, near the banks of the river, together with a guard-houſe, barracs, and all other neceſſary conveniences. While the report of the committee lay upon the table for the peruſal of the members, mr. Chancellor of the exchequer, by his majeſty's command, acquainted the houſe, that the king, having been informed of the ſubject matter of the petition, recommended it to the conſideration of the commons. Leave was immediately given to prepare a bill, founded on the reſolutions of the committee; which, having been duely conſidered, altered, and amended, paſſed through both houſes to the foot of the throne, where it obtained the royal ſanction. The magazine was accordingly removed to Purfleet, an inconſiderable and ſolitary village, where there will be little danger of accident, and where no great damage would attend an exploſion: but, in order to render this poſſible exploſion ſtill leſs dangerous, it would be neceſſary to form the magazine of ſmall diſtinct apartments, totally independent of each other, that, in caſe one ſhould be accidentally blown up, the reſt might ſtand unaffected. The ſame plan ought to be adopted in the conſtruction of all combuſtible ſtores ſubject to conflagration. The marine bill, and mutiny bill, as annual regulations, were prepared in the uſual form, paſſed both houſes without oppoſition, and received the royal aſſent.

The next affair that engroſſed the deliberation of the commons was a meaſure relating to the internal œconomy of the metropolis. The ſheriffs of London delivered a petition from the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, in common-council aſſembled, repreſenting, that ſeveral ſtreets, lanes, and paſſages within the city of London, and liberties thereof, were too narrow and incommodious for the paſſing and repaſſing as well of foot paſſengers as of coaches, carts, and other carriages, to the prejudice and inconvenience of the owners and inhabitants of houſes, and to the great hindrance of buſineſs, trade, and commerce. They alledged, that theſe defects might be remedied, and ſeveral new ſtreets opened within the ſaid city and liberties, to the great eaſe, ſafety, and convenience of paſſengers, as well as to the advantage of the public in general, if they, the petitioners, were enabled to widen and enlarge the narrow ſtreets, lanes, and paſſages, to open and lay out ſuch new ſtreets and ways, and to purchaſe the ſeveral houſes, buildings, and grounds which might be neceſſary for theſe purpoſes. They took notice, that there were ſeveral houſes within the city and liberties, partly erected over the ground of other proprietors; and others, of which the ſeveral floors or apartments belonged to different perſons; ſo that difficulties and diſputes frequently aroſe amongſt the ſaid ſeveral owners and proprietors about pulling down or re-building the party-walls and premiſſes; that ſuch re-building was often prevented or delayed, to the great injury and inconvenience of thoſe owners who were deſirous to re-build; that it would, therefore, be of public benefit, and frequently prevent the ſpreading of the fatal effects of fire, if ſome proviſion were made by law, as well for determining ſuch diſputes in a ſummary way, as for explaining and amending the laws then in being relating to the building of party-walls. They, therefore, prayed that leave might be given to bring in a bill for enabling the petitioners to widen and enlarge the ſeveral ſtreets, lanes, and paſſages, and to open new ſtreets and ways to be therein limited and deſcribed; as well for determining, in a ſummary way, all diſputes ariſing about the rebuilding of houſes or tenements within the ſaid city and liberties, wherein ſeveral perſons have an intermixed property; and for explaining and amending the laws in being relating to theſe particulars. A committee being appointed to examine the matter of this petition, agreed to a report, upon which leave was given to prepare a bill, and this was brought in accordingly. Next day a great number of citizens repreſented, in another petition, that the pavement of the city and liberties was often damaged, by being broken up for the purpoſes of amending or new-laying water-pipes belonging to the proprietors of water-works; and praying that proviſion might be made in the bill then depending to compel thoſe proprietors to make good any damage that ſhould be done to the pavement by the leaking or burſting of the water-pipes, or opening the pavement for alterations. In conſequence of this repreſentation, ſome amendments were made in the bill, which paſſed through both houſes, and was enacted into a law, under the title of 'An act for widening certain ſtreets, lanes, and paſſages, within the city of London and liberties thereof; and for opening certain new ſtreets and ways within the ſame, and for other purpoſes therein mentioned [d].

The inhabitants of Weſtminſter had long laboured under the want of a fiſh-market, and complained that the price of this ſpecies of proviſion was kept up at an exorbitant rate by the fraudulent combination of a few dealers, who engroſſed the whole market at Billingſgate, and deſtroyed great quantities of fiſh, in order to enhance the value of thoſe that remained. An act of parliament had paſſed in the 22d year of his preſent majeſty's reign, for eſtabliſhing a free market for the ſale of fiſh in Weſtminſter; and, ſeven years after that period, it was found neceſſary to procure a ſecond, for explaining and amending the firſt: but neither effectually anſwered the purpoſes of the legiſlature. In the month of January of the preſent ſeſſion the houſe took into conſideration a petition of the ſeveral fiſhermen trading to Billingſgate-market repreſenting the hardſhip to which they were expoſed by the ſaid acts; particularly forfeitures of veſſels and cargoes, incurred by the negligence of ſervants, who had omitted to make the particular entries which the two acts preſcribed. This petition being examined by a committee, and the report being made, leave was given to bring in a new bill, which ſhould contain effectual proviſion for the better ſupplying the cities of London and Weſtminſter with fiſh, and for preventing the abuſes of the fiſhmongers. It was intituled, 'A bill to repeal ſo much of an act paſſed in the 29th of George II. concerning a free market for fiſh at Weſtminſter as requires fiſhermen to enter their fiſhing-veſſels at the office of the ſearcher of the cuſtoms at Graveſend, and to regulate the ſale of fiſh at the firſt hand in the fiſh-markets in London and Weſtminſter; and to prevent ſaleſmen of fiſh buying fiſh to ſell again on their own account; and to allow bret and turbot, brill and pearl, although under the reſpective dimenſions mentioned in a former act, to be imported and ſold; and to puniſh perſons who ſhall take or ſell any ſpawn, brood, or fiſh of fry, unſizeable fiſh, or fiſh out of ſeaſon, or ſmelts under the ſize of five inches, and for other purpoſes.' Though this and the former bill, relating to the ſtreets and houſes of London, are inſtances that evince the care and attention of the legiſlature, even to minute particulars of the internal œconomy of the kingdom, we can hardly conſider them as objects of ſuch dignity and importance as to demand the deliberations of the parliament, but think they naturally fall within the cognizance of the municipal magiſtracy. After all, perhaps the moſt effectual method for ſupplying Weſtminſter with plenty of fiſh, at reaſonable rates, would be to execute with rigour the laws already enacted againſt foreſtalling and regrating; an expedient that would ſoon diſſolve all monopolies and combinations among the traders; to increaſe the number of markets in London and Weſtminſter; and to eſtabliſh two general markets at the Nore, one on each ſide of the river, where the fiſhing veſſels might unload their cargoes, and return to ſea without delay. A number of light boats might be employed to convey freſh fiſh from theſe marts to London and Weſtminſter, where all the different fiſh-markets might be plentifully ſupplied at a reaſonable expence; for it cannot be ſuppoſed, that while the freſh fiſh are brought up the river in the fiſhing ſmacs themſelves, which can hardly ſave the tides, to Billingſgate, they will ever dream of carrying their cargoes above bridge; or that the price of fiſh can be conſiderably lowered, while the fiſhing veſſels loſe ſo much time in running up to Graveſend or Billingſgate.

The annual committee being appointed to enquire what laws were expired, or near expiring, agreed to certain reſolutions; upon which a bill was prepared, and obtained the royal aſſent, importing a continuation of ſeveral laws, namely, the ſeveral clauſes mentioned of the acts in the fifth and eighth of George I. againſt clandeſtine running of uncuſtomed goods, except the clauſes relating to quarantine; the act paſſed in the third of George II. relating to the carrying rice from Carolina; the act in the ſeventh of the ſame reign, relating to cochineal and indigo; and that of the twelfth of George II. ſo far as it related to the importation of printed books. There was alſo a law enacted, to continue to the 29th day of September, in the year 1767, an act paſſed in the 12th year of queen Anne, for encouraging the making of ſail-cloth, by a duty of 1d. per ell laid upon all foreign-made ſails and ſail-cloth imported, and a bounty in the ſame proportion granted upon all home-made ſail-cloth and canvas fit for, or made into ſails, and exported; another act was paſſed, for continuing certain laws relating to the additional number of 100 hackney coaches and chairs, which law was rendered perpetual. The next law we ſhall mention was intended to be one of the moſt important that ever fell under the cognizance of the legiſlature: it was a law that affected the freedom, dignity, and independency of parliaments. By an act paſſed in the ninth year of the reign of queen Anne it was provided that no perſon ſhould be choſen a member of parliament who did not poſſeſs in England or Wales, an eſtate freehold or copyhold, for life, according to the following qualifications: for every knight of a ſhire 600l. per annum, over and above what will ſatisfy all incumberances; and 300l. per annum for every citizen, burgeſs, and baron of the cinque-ports. It was alſo decreed, that the return of any perſon not thus qualified ſhould be void; and that every candidate, ſhould, at the reaſonable requeſt of any other candidate at the time of election, or by two or more perſons who had a right to vote, take an oath preſcribed to eſtabliſh his qualifications. This reſtraint was by no means effectual. So many oaths of different kinds had been preſcribed ſince the Revolution, that they began to loſe the effect they were intended to have on the minds of men; and, in particular, political perjury grew ſo common, that it was no longer conſidered as a crime. Subterfuges were diſcovered, by means of which this law relating to the qualification of candidates was effectually eluded. Thoſe who were not actually poſſeſſed of ſuch eſtates procured temporary conveyances from their friends and patrons, on condition of their being reſtored and cancelled after the election. By this ſcandalous fraud the intention of the legiſlature was fruſtrated, the dignity of parliament proſtituted, the example of perjury and corruption extended, and the vengeance of heaven ſet at defiance. Through this infamous channel the miniſtry had it in their power to thruſt into parliament a ſet of venal beggars, who, as they depended upon their bounty, would always be obſequious to their will, and vote according to direction, without the leaſt regard to the dictates of their conſcience, or to the advantage of their country. The miſchiefs attending ſuch a vile colluſion, and in particular the undue influence which the crown muſt have acquired from the practice, were either felt or apprehended by ſome honeſt patriots, who after divers unſucceſsful efforts, at length preſented to the houſe a bill, importing that every perſon who ſhall be elected a member of the houſe of commons ſhould, before he preſumed to take his ſeat, deliver to the clerk of the houſe, at the table, while the commons are ſitting, and the ſpeaker in the chair, a paper or ſchedule, ſigned by himſelf, containing a rental or particular of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments whereby he makes out his qualification, ſpecifying the nature of his eſtate, whether meſſuage, land, rent, tythe, or what elſe; and if ſuch eſtate conſiſts of meſſuages, lands, or tythes, then ſpecifying in whoſe occupation they are; and if in rent, then ſpecifying the names of the owners or poſſeſſors of the lands and tenements out of which ſuch rent is iſſuing, and alſo ſpecifying the pariſh, townſhip, or precinct and county, in which the ſaid eſtate lies, and the value thereof; and every ſuch perſon ſhall, at the ſame time, alſo take and ſubſcribe the following oath, to be fairly written at the bottom of the paper or ſchedule:

'I A. B. do ſwear that the above is a true rental: and that I truly, and bonâ fide, have ſuch an eſtate in law or equity, to and for my own uſe and benefit, of and in the lands, tenements, or hereditaments above deſcribed, over and above what will ſatisfy and clear all incumberances that may affect the ſame; and that ſuch eſtate hath not been granted or made over to me fraudently, on purpoſe to qualify me to be a member of this houſe. So help me God!'

[d] The openings to be made, and the paſſages to be improved and enlarged, were aſcertained by two ſchedules, annexed to the act. With reſpect to the houſes, buildings, and grounds to be purchaſed, the mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city, in common-council aſſembled, or a committee appointed by them, were empowered to fix the price by agreement with the reſpective proprietors, or otherwiſe by a jury, in the uſual manner. With regard to party-walls, the act ordains, that the proprietor of either adjoining houſe may compel the proprietor of the other to agree to its being pulled down and re-built, and to pay a moiety of the expence, even though it ſhould not be neceſſary to pull down or re-build either of their houſes: that all party-walls ſhall be at leaſt two bricks and a half in thickneſs in the cellar, and two bricks thick upwards, to the top of the garret-floor. It enacts, that if any decayed houſe belongs to ſeveral proprietors, any one of them, who is deſirous to rebuild, may oblige the others to concur, and join with him in the expence, or purchaſe their ſhares at a price to be fixed by a jury. If any houſe ſhould hereafter be preſented by any inqueſt, or grand-jury, in London, as being in a ruinous condition, the court of mayor and aldermen is, by this act, empowered to pull it down at the expence of the ground-landlord. As to damaged pavements, not ſufficiently repaired by the proprietors of the water-works, any juſtice of the peace in London is veſted with power, upon their refuſing or delaying to make it good, to cauſe it to be effectually relayed with good materials at their expence.

It was provided that the ſaid paper or ſchedule, with the oath aforeſaid, ſhould be carefully kept by the clerk, to be inſpected by the members of the houſe of commons, without fee or reward: that if any perſon elected to ſerve in any future parliament ſhould preſume to ſit or vote as a member of the houſe of commons before he had delivered in ſuch a paper or ſchedule, and taken the oath aforeſaid, or ſhould not be qualified according to the true intent or meaning of this act, his election ſhall be void; and every perſon ſo ſitting and voting ſhall forfeit a certain ſum, to be recovered by ſuch perſon as ſhall ſue for the ſame by action or debt, bill, plaint, or information, whereon no eſſoign, privilege, protection, or wager of law ſhould be allowed, and only one imparlance: that if any perſon ſhould have delivered in, and ſworn to, his qualification as aforeſaid, and taken his ſeat in the houſe of commons, yet at any time after ſhould, during the continuance of ſuch parliament, ſell diſpoſe of, alien, or any otherwiſe incumber the eſtate, or any part thereof compriſed in the ſchedule, ſo as to leſſen or reduce the ſame under the value of the qualification by law directed; every ſuch perſon, under a certain penalty, muſt deliver in a new, or further qualification, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, and ſwear to the ſame, in manner before directed, before he ſhall again preſume to ſit or vote as a member of the houſe of commons; that in caſe any action, ſuit, or information ſhould be brought, in purſuance of this act, againſt any member of the houſe of commons, the clerk of the houſe ſhall, upon demand, forthwith deliver a true and atteſted copy of the paper or ſchedule ſo delivered into him as aforeſaid by ſuch member as the plantiff or proſecutor, or his attorney or agent, paying a certain ſum for the ſame; which being a true copy, ſhall be admitted to be given in evidence upon the trial of any iſſue in any ſuch action. Provided always, that nothing contained in this act ſhall extend to the eldeſt ſon or heir apparent of any peer or lord of parliament, or of any perſon qualified to ſerve as knight of the ſhire, or to the members for either of the univerſities in that part of Great-Britain called England, or to the members for that part of Great-Britain called Scotland. Such was the ſubſtance of the bill, as originally preſented to the houſe of commons; but it was altered in ſuch a manner, as, we are afraid, will fail in anſwering the ſalutary purpoſes for which it was intended by thoſe who brought it into the houſe. Notwithſtanding the proviſions made in the act as it now ſtands, any miniſter or patron may ſtill introduce his penſioners, clerks, and creatures into the houſe, by means of the old method of temporary conveyance, though the farce muſt now be kept up until the member ſhall have delivered in his ſchedule, taken his oath, and his ſeat in parliament; then he may deliver up his conveyance, or execute a reconveyance, without running any riſk of loſing his ſeat, or of being puniſhed for his fraud or perjury. The extenſive influence of the crown, the general corruptibility of individuals, and the obſtacles ſo induſtriouſly thrown in the way of every ſcheme contrived to vindicate the independency of parliaments, muſt have produced very mortifying reflections on the breaſt of every Britain warmed with the genuine love of his country. He muſt have perceived that all the bulwarks of the conſtitution were little better than buttreſſes of ice, which would infallibly thaw before the heat of miniſterial influence, when artfully concentrated; that either a miniſter's profeſſions of patriotiſm were inſincere, or his credit inſufficient to effect any eſſential alteration in the unpopular meaſures of government; and that, after all, the liberties of the nation could never be ſo firmly eſtabliſhed, as by the power, generoſity, and virtue of a patriot king. This inference could not fail to awake the remembrance of that amiable prince, whom fate untimely ſnatched from the eager hopes and warm affection of a whole nation, before he had it in his power to manifeſt and eſtabliſh his favourite maxin, That a monarch's glory was inſeparably connected with the happineſs of his people.[e]

[1760] On the 1ſt day of February, a motion was made, and leave given, to bring in a bill for enabling his majeſty to make leaſes and copies of offices, lands, and hereditaments, parcel of his duchy of Cornwall, or annexed to the ſame; accordingly, it paſſed through both houſes without oppoſition, and enacted, that all leaſes and grants made, or to be made, by his majeſty, within ſeven years next enſuing in, or annexed to, the ſaid duchy, under the limitations therein mentioned, ſhould be good and effectual in law againſt his majeſty, his heirs, and ſucceſſors, and againſt all other perſons that ſhould hereafter inherit the ſaid duchy, either by act of parliament, or any limitation whatſoever. This act appears the more extraordinary, as the prince of Wales, who has a ſort of right by preſcription to the duchy of Cornwall, was then of age, and might have been put in poſſeſſion of it by the paſſing of a patent. The houſe having peruſed an account of the produce of the fund eſtabliſhed for paying annuities granted in the year 1759, with the charge on that fund on the 5th of January the ſucceeding year, it appeared that there had been a conſiderable deficiency in the ſaid fund on the 5th of July preceeding, and this had been made good out of the ſinking-fund, by a reſolution of the 7th of February, already particulariſed. They, therefore, inſtructed the committee of ways and means to conſider ſo much of the annuity and lottery act paſſed in the preceding ſeſſion as related to the three per centum annuities, amounting to the ſum of 7,590,000l. granted in the year 1759; and alſo to conſider ſo much of the ſaid act as related to the ſubſidy of poundage upon certain goods and merchandize to be imported into this kingdom, and the additional inland duty on coffee and chocolate. The committee having taken theſe points into deliberation, agreed to the two reſolutions we have already mentioned, with reſpect to the conſolidation, and a bill was brought in for adding thoſe annuities granted in the year 1759 to the joint ſtoc of three per centum annuities conſolidated by the acts of the 25th, 28th, 29th, and 32d years of his majeſty's reign; and for ſeveral duties therein mentioned, to the ſinking-fund. The committee was afterwards empowered to receive a clauſe for cancelling ſuch lottery tickets as were made forth in purſuance of an act paſſed in the 30th year of his majeſty's reign, and were not then diſpoſed of: a clauſe for this purpoſe was accordingly added to the bill, which paſſed through both houſes without oppoſition, and received the royal aſſent at the end of the ſeſſion.

On the 29th day of April, lord North preſented to the houſe a bill for encouraging the exportation of rum and ſpirits of the growth, produce, and manufacture of the [e] The following declaration made to the chiefs of the oppoſition will render the memory of the late prince of Wales dear to lateſt poſterity:

His royal highneſs has authoriſed lord T. and ſir F. D. to give the moſt poſitive aſſurances to the gentlemen in the oppoſition of his upright intentions; that he is thoroughly convinced of the diſtreſſes and calamities that have befallen, and every day are more likely to befall, this country: and therefore invites all well-wiſhers to this country and its conſtitution to coaleſe and unite with him, and upon the following principle only:

His royal highneſs promiſes, and will declare it openly, that it is his intention totally to aboliſh any diſtinctions for the future of parties; and as far as lies in his power, and as ſoon as it does lie in his power, to take away for ever all proſcription from any ſet of men whatever who are friends to the conſtitution: and therefore, will promote for the preſent, and when it is in his power, will immediately grant,

Firſt, a bill to empower all gentlemen to act as juſtices of peace paying land-tax for 300l. per annum, in any county where he intends to ſerve.

Secondly, His royal highneſs promiſes in like manner, to ſupport, and forthwith grant, whenever he ſhall have it in his power, a bill to create and eſtabliſh a numerous and effectual militia throughout the kingdom.

Thirdly, His royal highneſs promiſes, in like manner, to promote and ſupport, and likewiſe grant, when it is in his power, a bill to exclude all military officers in the land-ſervice, under the degree of colonels of regiments, and in the ſea-ſervice, under the degree of rear-admirals, from ſitting in the houſe of commons.

Fourthly, His royal highneſs promiſes that he will, when in his power, grant enquiries into the great number of abuſes in offices, and does not doubt of the aſſiſtance of all honeſt men, to enable him to correct the ſame for the future.

Fifthly, His royal highneſs promiſes, and will openly declare, that he will make no agreement with, or join in the ſupport of any adminiſtration whatever, without previouſly obtaining the above-mentioned points in behalf of the people, and for the ſake of good government. Upon theſe conditions and theſe conditions only, his royal highneſs thinks he has a right not to doubt of having a moſt cordial ſupport from all thoſe good men who mean their country and this conſtitution well, and that they will become his and his family's friends, and unite with him to promote the good government of this country and that they will follow him, upon theſe principles, both in court and out of court, and if he ſhould live to form an adminiſtration, it ſhould be compoſed without diſtinction of men of dignity, knowledge and probity. His royal higneſs further promiſes to accept of no more, if offered to him, than 800,000l. for his civil-liſt, by way of rent-charge.

Anſwer to the foregoing propoſal.

THE lords and gentlemen to whom a paper has been communicated, containing his royal highneſs the prince's gracious intentions upon ſeveral weighty and important points, of the greateſt conſequence to the honour and intereſt of his majeſty's government, and abſolutely neceſſary for the reſtoring and perpetuating the true uſe and deſign of parliament, the purity of our excellent conſtitution, and the happineſs and welfare of the whole nation, do therein with the greateſt ſatisfaction obſerve, and moſt gratefully acknowledge, the uprightneſs and generoſity of his royal highneſs's noble ſentiments and reſolutions. And, therefore, beg leave to return their moſt dutiful and humble thanks for the ſame, and to aſſure his royal highneſs that they will conſtantly and ſteadily uſe their utmoſt endeavours to ſupport thoſe his wiſe and ſalutary purpoſes, that the throne may be ſtrengthened, religion and morality encouraged, faction and corruption deſtroyed, the purity and eſſence of parliament reſtored, and the happineſs and welfare of our conſtituti- preſerved.

When the above anſwer was returned to the prince, there were preſent,

The duke of B—, the earl of L—, the earl of S—, the earl of T—, the earl of W—, the earl of S—, lord F—, lord W—, ſir Watkin William Wynne, ſir John H. C—, ſir Walter B—, ſir Robert G—, mr. F—, mr. P—, mr. C—.

Britiſh ſugar plantations from Great-Britain, and of Britiſh ſpirits made from melaſſes; a bill which in a little time acquired the ſanction of the royal aſſent. Towards the end of April, admiral Townſhend preſented a bill for the more ſecuring the payment of ſuch prize and bounty monies as are appropriated to the uſe of the Greenwich-hoſpital by an act paſſed in the 29th year of his majeſty's reign. As by that law no time was limitted, or particular method preſcribed for giving notifications of the day appointed for the payment of the ſhares of the prizes and bounty money; and many agents had neglected to ſpecify in the notification given in the London Gazette for payment of ſhares of prizes condemned in the courts of admiralty in Great-Britain, the particular day or time when ſuch payments were to commence, whereby it was rendered difficult, if not impoſſible, to aſcertain the time when the hoſpital at Greenwich became entitled to the unclaimed ſhares, of conſequence could not enjoy the full benefit of the act: the bill now prepared imported, that from and after the 1ſt day of September in the preſent year, all notifications of the payment of the ſhares of prizes taken by any of his majeſty's ſhips of war, and condemned in Great-Britain, and from and after the firſt day of February, in the year 1761, all notifications of the payment of the ſhares and prizes taken and condemned in any other of his majeſty's dominions in Europe, or in any of the Britiſh plantations in America; and from and after the 25th day of December, in the year 1761, all notifications of the payment of the ſhares of prizes taken and condemned in any other of his majeſty's dominions, ſhall be reſpectively given and publiſhed in the following manner: if the prize be condemned in any court of admiralty in Great-Britain, ſuch notification, under the agent's hand, ſhall be publiſhed in the London Gazette: and if condemned in any court of admiralty in any other of his majeſty's dominions, ſuch notification ſhall be publiſhed in like manner in the Gazette, or other newſpaper of public authority, of the iſland or place where the prize is condemned; and if there ſhould be no gazette, or ſuch newſpaper publiſhed there, then in ſome or one of the public newſpapers of the place; and ſuch agents ſhall deliver to the collector, cuſtomer, or ſearcher, or his lawful deputy, and if there ſhall be no ſuch officer, then the principal officer, or officers of the place where the prize is condemned, or to the lawful deputy of ſuch principal officer, two of the gazettes or other newſpapers in which ſuch notifications are inſerted; and if there ſhall not be any public newſpapers in any ſuch iſland or place, the agent ſhall give two ſuch notifications in writing, under his hand; and every ſuch collector, or other officer as aforeſaid, ſhall ſubſcribe his name on both the ſaid gazettes, newſpapers, or written notifications, and, by the firſt ſhip which ſhall ſail from thence to any port of Great-Britain, ſhall tranſmit to the treaſurer or deputy treaſurers of the ſaid royal hoſpital one of the ſaid notifications, with his name ſo ſubſcribed, to be there regiſtered, and ſhall faithfully preſerve and keep the other, with his name thereon ſubſcribed in his own cuſtody; and in every notification as aforeſaid the agent ſhall ſpecify his place of abode, and the preciſe day of the month and year appointed for the payment of the reſpective ſhares to the captors; and all notifications with reſpect to prizes condemned in Great-Britain ſhall be publiſhed in the London Gazette three days at leaſt before any ſhare of ſuch prize ſhall be paid; and with reſpect to prizes condemned in any other part of his majeſty's dominions, ſuch notifications ſhall be delivered to the ſaid collector, or other officers as aforeſaid, three days at leaſt before any ſhare of ſuch prize ſhall be paid. It was likewiſe enacted, that the agents for the diſtribution of bounty-bills ſhould inſert, and publiſh under their hands, in the London Gazette, three days at leaſt before payment, public notifications of the day and year appointed, for ſuch payment, and alſo inſert therein their reſpective places of abode. The bill, even as it now ſtands, is liable to ſeveral objections. It may be dangerous to leave the money of the unclaimed ſhares ſo long as three years in the hands of the agent, who, together with his ſecurities, may prove inſolvent before the expiration of that term: then the time preſcribed to the ſailors within which their claim is limited appears to be too ſhort, when we conſider that they may be ſo circumſtanced, turned over to another ſhip, and conveyed to a diſtant part of the globe, that they ſhall have no opportunity to claim payment; and ſhould three years elapſe before they could make application to the agent, they would find their bounty or prize-money appropriated to the uſe of Greenwich-hoſpital; nay, ſhould they die in the courſe of the voyage, it would be loſt to their heirs and executors, who being ignorant of their title, could not poſſibly claim within the time limited.

A committee having been appointed to enquire into the original ſtandards of weights and meaſures in the kingdom of England, to conſider the laws relating thereto, and to report their obſervations thereupon, together with their opinion of the moſt effectual means for aſcertaining and enforcing uniform and certain ſtandards of weights and meaſures, they prepared copies, models, patterns, and multiples, and preſented them to the houſe: then they were locked up by the clerk of the houſe; and lord Caryſfort preſented a bill, according to order, for enforcing uniformity of weights and meaſures to the ſtandards by law to be eſtabliſhed: but this meaſure, which had been ſo long in dependence, was not yet fully diſcuſſed, and the ſtandards and weights were reſerved to another occaſion. A law was made for reviving and continuing ſo much of an act paſſed in the 12ſt year of his majeſty's reign as relates to the more effectual trial and puniſhment of high-treaſon in the highlands of Scotland; and alſo for continuing two other acts paſſed in the 19th and 21ſt years of his majeſty's reign, ſo far as they relate to the more effectual diſarming the highlands of Scotland, and ſecuring the peace thereof; and to allow further time for making affidavits of the execution of articles or contracts of clerks to attornies or ſolicitors, and filing thereof. The king having been pleaſed to pardon George Keith, earl Mariſchal of Scotland, who had been attainted for rebellion in the year 1716, the parliament confirmed this indulgence, by paſſing an act to enable the ſaid George Keith, late earl Mariſchal, to ſue or entertain any action of ſuit, notwithſtanding his attainder, and to remove any diſability in him, by reaſon of the ſaid attainder, to take or inherit any real or perſonal eſtate that may and ſhall hereafter deſcend or come to him, or which he was intitled to in reverſion or remainder before his attainder. This nobleman, univerſally reſpected for his probity and underſtanding, had been employed as embaſſador to the court of France by the king of Pruſſia, and was actually at this juncture in the ſervice of that monarch, who, in all probability, interceded with the king of England in his behalf. When his pardon had paſſed the ſeals, he repaired to London, and was preſented to his majeſty, by whom he was very graciouſly received.

Theſe and a good number of other bills of leſs importance, both private and public, were paſſed into laws by commiſſion, on the 22d day of May, when the lord-keeper of the great ſeal cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes. He began with an aſſurance that his majeſty looked back on their proceeding with entire ſatisfaction. He ſaid, the duty and affection which they had expreſſed for the king's perſon and government, the zeal and unanimity they had ſhowed in maintaining the true intereſt of their country, could only be equalled by what his majeſty had formerly experienced from this parliament. He told them it would have given his majeſty the moſt ſenſible pleaſure, had he been able to aſſure them that his endeavours to promote a general peace had met with more ſuitable returns. He obſerved, that his majeſty, in conjunction with his good brother and ally, the king of Pruſſia, had choſen to give their enemies proofs of this equitable diſpoſition, in the midſt of a ſeries of glorious victories; an opportunity the moſt proper to take ſuch a ſtep with dignity, and to manifeſt to all Europe the purity and moderation of his views. After ſuch a conduct, he ſaid, the king had the comfort to reflect that the further continuance of the calamities of war could not be imputed to him or his allies; that he truſted in the bleſſing of heaven upon the juſtice of his arms, and upon thoſe ample means which the zeal of the parliament in ſo good a cauſe had wiſely put into his hands, that his future ſucceſſes in carrying on the war would not fall ſhort of the paſt; and that, in the event, the public tranquillity would be reſtored on ſolid and durable foundations. He acquainted them that his majeſty had taken the moſt effectual care to augment the combined army in Germany: and at the ſame time to keep up ſuch a force at home as might fruſtrate any attemps of the enemy to invade theſe kingdoms; ſuch attemps as had hitherto ended only in their own confuſion. He took notice that the royal navy was never in a more flouriſhing and reſpectable condition; and the ſingle victory obtained laſt winter over the French fleet on their own coaſts had given luſtre to his majeſty's arms, freſh ſpirit to his maritime forces, and reduced the naval ſtrength of France to a very low ebb. He gave them to underſtand that his majeſty had diſpoſed his ſquadrons in ſuch a manner as might beſt conduce to the annoyance of his enemies; to the defence of his own dominions, both in Europe and America; to the preſerving and purſuing his conqueſts as well as to the protection of his ſubjects, which he had extremely at heart. He told the commons, that nothing could relieve his majeſty's royal mind, under the anxiety he felt for the burthens of his faithful ſubjects, but the public-ſpirited chearfulneſs with which the houſe had granted him ſuch large ſupplies, and his conviction that they were neceſſary for the ſecurity and eſſential intereſts of his kingdoms; he, therefore, returned them his hearty thanks for theſe ſupplies, and aſſured them they ſhould be duely applied to the purpoſes for which they had been given. Finally he recommended to both houſes the continuance of that union and good harmony which he had obſerved with ſo much pleaſure, and from which he had derived ſuch important effects. He deſired they would ſtudy to promote theſe deſirable objects, to ſupport the king's government, and the good order of their reſpective counties, and conſult their own real happineſs and proſperity.

The ſucceſſes of the laſt campaign had flushed the whole nation with the moſt elevated hope of future conqueſt, and the government was enabled to take every ſtep which appeared neceſſary to realiſe that ſanguine expectation: but the war became every day more and more Germaniſed. Notwithſtanding the immenſe ſums that were raiſed for the expence of the current year; notwithſtanding the great number of land-forces maintained in the ſervice, and the numerous fleets that filled the harbours of Great-Britain, we do not find that one freſh effort was made to improve the advantages ſhe had gained upon her own element; or for puſhing the war on national principles; for the reduction of Canada was no more than the conſequence of the meaſures which had been taken in the preceding campaign. But, before we record the progreſs of the war, it may be neceſſary to ſpecify ſome domeſtic occurrences, that for a little while engroſſed the public attention. In the month of December, in the preceding year, William Andrews Horne, a gentleman of ſome fortune in Derbyſhire, was executed at Nottingham, in the 74th year of his age, for the murder of an infant born of his own ſiſter, in the year 1724. On the 3d day after the birth, this brutal ruffian thruſt the child into a linen bag, and, accompanied by his own brother on horſebac, conveyed it to Anneſley, in Nottinghamſhire, where it was next day found dead under a hay-ſtack. Though this cruel ruſtic knew how much he lay at the mercy, of his brother, whom he had made privy to this affair, far from endeavouring to engage his ſecreſy by offices of kindneſs and marks of affection, he treated him as an alien to his blood; not barely with indifference, but even in the moſt barbarous rigour. He not only defrauded him of his right, but exacted of him the loweſt menial ſervices; beheld him ſtarving in a cottage, while he lived himſelf in affluence; and refuſed to relieve with a morſel of charity the children of his own brother begging at his gate. It was reſentment of this pride and barbarity, which in all likelihood, firſt impelled the other to revenge. He pretended qualms of conſcience, and diſcloſed the tranſaction of the child to ſeveral individuals. As the brother was univerſally hated for the inſolence and brutality of his diſpoſition, information was given againſt him, and a reſolution formed to bring him to condign puniſhment. Being informed of this deſign, he tampered with his brother, and deſired that he would retract, upon the trial, the evidence he had given before the juſtices. Though the brother rejected this ſcheme of ſubordination, he offered to withdraw himſelf from the kingdom, if he might have 5l. to defray the expence of his removal. So ſordidly varicious was the other, that he refuſed to advance this miſerable pittance though he knew his own life depended upon his compliance. He was accordingly apprehended, tried, and convicted on his brother's evidence; and then he confeſſed the particulars of his expoſing the infant. He denied, indeed, that he had any thought the child would periſh, and declared he intended it as a preſent to the gentleman at whoſe gate it was laid: but as he appeared to be a hardened miſcreant, devoid of humanity, ſtained with the complicated crimes of tyranny, fraud, rapine, inceſt, and murder, very little credit is due to his declaration. In the courſe of the ſame month, part of Weſtminſter was grievouſly alarmed by a dreadful conflagration, which broke out in the houſe of a cabinet-maker near Covent-Garden, raged with great fury, and reduced near 20 houſes to aſhes. Many others were damaged, and ſeveral perſons either burned in their apartments, or buried under the ruins. The bad conſequences of this calamity were in a great meaſure alleviated by the humanity of the public, and the generous compaſſion of the prince of Wales, who contributed liberally to the relief of the ſufferers.

But no ſubject ſo much engroſſed the converſation and paſſions of the public as did the caſe of lord George Sackville, who had by this time reſigned his command in Germany, and returned to England, the country which, of all others, it would have been his intereſt to avoid at this juncture, if he was really conſcious of the guilt, the imputation of which his character now ſuſtained. With the firſt tidings of the battle fought at Minden the defamation of this officer arrived. He was accuſed of having diſobeyed orders, and his conduct repreſented as infamous in every particular. Theſe were the ſuggeſtions of a vague report, which no perſon could trace to its origin; yet this report immediately gave birth to one of the moſt inflammatory pamphlets that ever was exhibited to the public. The firſt charge had alarmed the people of England, jealous in honour, ſudden and raſh in their reſentments, and obſtinately adhering to the prejudices they have eſpouſed. The implied accuſation in the orders of prince Ferdinand, and the combuſtible matter ſuperadded, by the pamphlet writer, kindled up ſuch a blaze of indignation in the minds of the people, as admitted of no temperament or controul. An abhorence and deteſtation of lord George Sackville, as a coward and a traitor, became the univerſal paſſion, which acted by contagion, infecting all degrees of people from the cottage to the throne; and no individual, who had the leaſt regard for his own character and quiet, would venture to preach up moderation, or even adviſe a ſuſpenſion of belief until more certain information could be received. Freſh fuel was continually thrown in by obſcure authors of pamphlets and news-papers, who ſtigmatiſed and inſulted with ſuch virulent perſeverance, that one would have imagined they were actuated by perſonal motives, not retained by mercenary bookſellers, againſt that unfortunate nobleman. Not ſatisfied with inventing circumſtances to his diſhonour, in his conduct on the laſt occaſion, they pretended to take a retroſpective view of his character, and produced a number of anecdotes to his prejudice, which had never before ſeen the light, and but for this occaſion had probably never been known. Not that all the writings which appeared on this ſubject contained freſh matter of aggravation againſt lord George Sackville. Some writers, either animated by the hope of advantage, or hired to betray the cauſe which they undertook to defend, entered the liſts as profeſſed champions of the accuſed, aſſumed the pen in his behalf, devoid of ſenſe, unfurniſhed with materials, and produced performances which could not fail to injure his character among all thoſe who believed that he countenanced their endeavours, and ſupplied them with the facts and arguments of his defence. Such preciſely was the ſtate of the diſpute when lord George arrived in London. While prince Ferdinand was crownd with laurels: while the king of Great-Britain approved his conduct, and as the moſt glorious mark of that approbation, inveſted him with the order of the garter; while his name was celebrated through all England, and extolled, in the warmeſt expreſſions of hyperbole, above all the heroes of antiquity; every mouth was opened in execration of the late commander of the Britiſh troops in Germany. He was now made acquainted with the particulars of his imputed guilt, which he had before indiſtinctly learned. He was accuſed of having diſobeyed three ſucceſſive orders he had received from the general, during the action at Minden, to advance with the cavalry of the right wing, which he commanded, and ſuſtain the infantry that were engaged; and after the cavalry were put in motion, of having halted them unneceſſarily, and marched ſo ſlow, that they could not reach the place of action in time to be of any ſervice; by which conduct the opportunity was loſt of attacking the enemy when they gave way, and rendering the victory more glorious and deciſive. The firſt ſtep which lord George took towards his own vindication with the public, was in printing a ſhort addreſs, entreating them to ſuſpend their belief with reſpect to his character until the charge brought againſt him ſhould be legally diſguſſed by a court-martial; a trial which he had already ſollicited, and was in hopes of obtaining.

Finding himſelf unable to ſtem the tide of popular prejudice, which flowed againſt him with irreſiſtible impetuoſity, he might have retired in quiet and ſafety, and left it to ebb at leiſure. This would have been generally deemed a prudential ſtep, by all thoſe who conſidered the unfavourable medium through which every particular of his conduct muſt have been viewed at that juncture, even by men who cheriſhed the moſt candid intentions; when they reflected upon the power, influence, and popularity of his accuſer; the danger of aggravating the reſentment of the ſovereign, already too conſpicuous, and the riſk of hazarding his life on the honour and integrity of witneſſes, who might think their fortunes depended upon the nature of the evidence they ſhould give. Notwithſtanding thoſe ſuggeſtions lord George, ſeemingly impatient of the imputation under which his character laboured, inſiſted upon the privilege of a legal trial, which was granted accordingly, after the judges had given it as their opinion that he might be tried by a court-martial, though he no longer retained any commiſſion in the ſervice. A court of general officers being appointed and aſſembled to enquire into his conduct, the judge-advocate gave him to underſtand that he was charged with having diſobeyed the orders of prince Ferdinand, relative to the battle of Minden. That the reader may have the more diſtinct idea of the charge, it is neceſſary to remind him that lord George Sackville commanded the cavalry of the right wing, conſiſting of Hanoverian and Britiſh horſe, diſpoſed in two lines, the Britiſh being at the extremity of the right, extending to the village of Hartum: the Hanoverian cavalry forming the left, that reached almoſt to an open wood or grove, which divided the horſe from the line of infantry, particularly from that part of the line of infantry, conſiſting of two brigades of Britiſh foot, the Hanoverian guards, and Hardenberg's regiment. This was the body of troops which ſuſtained the brunt of the battle with the moſt incredible courage and perſeverance. They of their own accord advanced to attac the left of the enemy's cavalry, through a moſt dreadful fire of artillery and ſmall arms, to which they were expoſed in front and flank; they withſtood the repeated attacs of the whole French gendarmerie, whom, at length, they totally routed, together with a body of Saxon troops on their left, and to their valour the victory was chiefly owing. The ground from which theſe troops advanced was a kind of heath or plain, which opened a conſiderable way to the left, where the reſt of the army was formed in order of battle; but on the right it was bounded by the wood, on the other ſide of which the cavalry of the right wing was poſted, having in front the village of Halen, from whence the French had been driven by the piquets in the army there poſted, and in front of them a windmill, ſituated in the middle ſpace between them and a battery placed on the left of the enemy.

Early in the morning capt. Malhorti had, by order of prince Ferdinand, poſted the cavalry of the right wing in the ſituation we have juſt deſcribed, the village of Hartum with incloſures on the right, a narrow wood on the left, the village of Halen in their front, and a windmill in the middle of an open plain, which led directly to the enemy. In this poſition lord George Sackville was directed to remain, until he ſhould receive further orders; and here it was thoſe orders were given which he was ſaid to have diſobeyed. Indeed, he was previouſly charged with having neglected the orders of the preceding evening, which imported that the horſes ſhould be ſaddled at one in the morning, though the tents were not to be ſtruc, nor the troops under arms, until they ſhould receive further orders. He was accuſed of having diſobeyed theſe orders, and of having come late into the field, after the cavalry was formed. Captain Winchingrode, aide-du-camp to prince Ferdinand, declared upon oath, that while the infantry of the right wing were advancing towards the enemy for the ſecond time, he was ſent with orders to lord George Sackville to advance with the cavalry of the right wing, and ſuſtain the infantry, which was going to engage, by forming the horſe under his command, upon the heath, in a third line behind the regiments; that he delivered theſe orders to lord George Sackville, giving him to underſtand that he ſhould march the cavalry through the wood or trees on his left to the heath where they were to be formed; that, on his return to the heath, he met colonel Fitzroy riding at full gallop towards lord George; and that he (Winchingrode) followed him bac, in order to haſten the march of the cavalry. Colonel Ligonier another of the prince's aides-du-camp, depoſed that he carried orders from the general to lord George to advance with the cavalry, in order to profit from the diſorder which appeared in the enemy's cavalry; that lord George made no anſwer to theſe orders, but turning to the troops, commanded them to draw their ſwords, and march; that the colonel ſeeing them advance a few paces on the right forwards, told his lordſhip he muſt march to the left; that in the mean time colonel Fitzroy arriving with orders for the Britiſh cavalry only to advance, lord George ſaid the orders were contradictory, and colonel Ligonier replied, they differed only in numbers, but the deſtination of his march was the ſame, to the left. Colonel Fitzroy, the third aide-du-camp to prince Ferdinand, gave evidence, that when he told lord George it was the prince's order for the Britiſh cavalry to advance towards the left, his lordſhip obſerved that it was different from the order brought by colonel Ligonier, and he could not think the prince intended to break the line; that he aſked which way the cavalry was to march, and who was to be their guide; that when he (the aide-du-camp) offered to lead the column through the wood on the left, his lordſhip ſeemed ſtill diſſatisfied with the order, ſaying it did not agree with the order brought by colonel Ligonier, and deſired to be conducted in perſon to the prince, that he might have an explanation from his own mouth; a reſolution which was immediately executed. The next evidence, an officer of rank in the army, made oath that, in his opinion, when the orders were delivered to lord George, his lordſhip was alarmed to a very great degree, and ſeemed to be in the utmoſt confuſion. A certain nobleman, of high rank and unblemiſhed reputation, declared, that captain Winchingrode having told him it was abſolutely neceſſary that the cavalry ſhould march, and form a line to ſupport the foot, he had given orders to the ſecond line to march; that as ſoon as they arrived at the place where the action began, he was met by colonel Fitzroy, with an order for the cavalry to advance as faſt as poſſible; that in marching to this place, an order came to halt, until they could be joined by the firſt line of cavalry; that afterwards, in advancing, they were again halted by Lord George Sackville; that, in his opinion, they might have marched with more expedition, and even come up time enough to act againſt the enemy: ſome other officers who were examined on this ſubject, agreed with the marquis in theſe ſentiments.

Lord George, in his defence, proved, by undeniable evidence, that he never received the orders iſſued on the eve of the battle, nor any ſort of intimation or plan of action, although he was certainly entitled to ſome ſuch communication, as commander in chief of the Britiſh forces; that, nevertheleſs, the orders concerning the horſes were obeyed by thoſe who received them; that lord George inſtead of loitering or loſing time while the troops were forming, prepared to put himſelf at the head of the cavalry on the firſt notice that they were in motion: that he was ſo eager to perform his duty, as to ſet out from his quarters without even waiting for an aide-du-camp to attend him, and was in the field before any general officer of his diviſion. He declared, that when captain Winchingrode delivered the order to form the cavalry in one line, making a third, to advance and ſuſtain the infantry, he neither heard him ſay he was to march by the left, nor ſaw him point with his ſword to the wood through which he was to paſs. Neither of theſe directions were obſerved by any of the aides-du-camp or officers then preſent, except one gentleman, the perſon who bore witneſs to the confuſion in the looks and deportment of his lordſhip. It was proved that the neareſt and moſt practicable way of advancing againſt the enemy was by the way of the windmill, to the left of the village of Halen. It appeared that lord George imagined this was the only way by which he ſhould be ordered to advance; that, in this perſuaſion, he had ſent an officer to reconnoitre the village of Halen, as an object of importance, as it would have been upon the flank of the cavalry in advancing forwards; that when he received the order from Winchingrode to form the line, and advance, he ſtill imagined this was his rout, and, on this ſuppoſition, immediately detached an aide-du-camp to remove a regiment of Saxe-Gotha, which was in the front; that he ſent a ſecond to obſerve the place where the infantry were, and a third to reconnoitre the enemy; that in a few minutes colonel Ligonier coming up with an order from prince Ferdinand to advance the cavalry, his lordſhip immediately drew his ſword, and ordered them to march forward by the windmill. The colonel declared that when he delivered the order, he added 'by the left;' but lord George affirmed that he heard no ſuch direction, nor did it reach the ears of any other perſon then preſent, except of that officer who witneſſed to the ſame direction given by Winchingrode. It was proved that immediately after the troops were put in motion. Colonel Fitzroy arrived with an order from prince Ferdinand, importing, that the Britiſh cavalry only ſhould advance by the left; that lord George declared their orders were contradictory, and ſeemed the more puzzled, as he underſtood that both the gentlemen came off nearly at the ſame time from the prince, and were probably directed to communicate the ſame order. It was, therefore, natural to ſuppoſe there was a miſtake, as there might be danger in breaking the line, as the rout by the wood appeared more difficult and tedious than that by the windmill, which led directly through open ground to the enemy, and as he could not think that if a body of horſe was immediately wanted, the general would ſend for the Britiſh, that were at the fartheſt extremity of the wing, rather than for the Hanoverian cavalry, who formed the left of the line, and conſequently were much nearer the ſcene of action. It was proved that lord George, in this uncertainty, reſolved to apply for an explanation to the prince in perſon, who he underſtood was at a ſmall diſtance; that with this view, he ſet out with all poſſible expedition; that having entered the wood, and perceived that the country beyond it opened ſooner to the left than he had imagined, and captain Smith, his aide-du-camp, adviſing that the Britiſh cavalry ſhould be put in motion, he ſent bac that gentleman, with orders for them to advance by the left with all poſſible diſpatch; that he rode up to the general, who received him without any marks of diſpleaſure, and ordered him to bring up the whole cavalry of the right wing in a line upon the heath; an order, as the reader will perceive, quite different from that which was ſo warmly eſpouſed by the aide-du-camp; that as the marquis of Granby had already put the ſecond line in motion, according to a ſeparate order which he had received, and the head of his column was already in view, coming out of the wood, lord George thought it neceſſary to halt the troops on the left, until the right ſhould come into the line, and afterwards ſend them orders to march ſlower, that two regiments, which had been thrown out of the line, might have an opportunity to replace themſelves in their proper ſtations.

With reſpect to the confuſion which one officer affirmed was perceivable in the countenance and deportment of this commander, a conſiderable number of other officers then preſent, being interrogated by his lordſhip, unanimouſly declared that they ſaw no ſuch marks of confuſion, but that he delivered his orders with all the marks of coolneſs and deliberation. The candid reader will of himſelf determine, whether a man's heart is to be judged by any change of his complexion, granting ſuch a change to have happened; whether the evidence of one witneſs, in ſuch a caſe, will weigh againſt the concurrent teſtimony of all the officers whoſe immediate buſineſs it was to attend and obſerve the commander: whether it was likely that an officer, who had been more than once in actual ſervice, and behaved without reproach, ſo as to attain ſuch an eminent rank in the army, ſhould exhibit ſymptoms of fear and confuſion, when there was in reality no appearance of danger; for none of the orders imported that he ſhould attac the enemy, but only advance to ſuſtain the infantry. The time which elapſed from the firſt order he received by captain Winchingrode, to the arrival of colonel Ligonier, did not exceed eight minutes, during which his aid-du-camp, captain Hugo, was employed in removing the Saxe-Gotha regiment from the front, by which he propoſed to advance. From that period till the cavalry actually marched, in conſequence of an order from lord George, the length of time was differently eſtimated in the opinions of different witneſſes, but, a medium, computed by the judge-advocate at fifteen minutes, during which the following circumſtances were tranſacted; the troops were firſt ordered to advance forwards, then halted; the contradictory orders arrived and were diſputed; the commander deſired the two aides-du-camp to agree about which was the preciſe order, and he would obey it immediately; each inſiſting upon that which he had delivered, lord George haſtened to the general for an explanation; and, as he paſſed the wood, ſent bac captain Smith to the right of the cavalry, which was at a conſiderable diſtance, to put the Britiſh horſe in motion. We ſhall not pretend to determine whether the commander of ſuch an important body may be excuſable for heſitating, when he receives contradictory orders at the ſame time, eſpecially when both orders run counter to his own judgement; whether in that caſe it is allowable for him to ſuſpend the operation for a few minutes, in order to conſult in perſon the commander in chief about a ſtep of ſuch conſequence to the preſervation of the whole army. Neither will we venture to decide dogmatically on the merits of the march, after the cavalry were put in motion; whether they marched two ſlow, or were unneceſſarily halted, in their way to the heath. It was proved, indeed, that lord George was always remarkably ſlow in his movements of cavalry, on the ſuppoſition that if horſes are blown they muſt be unfit for ſervice, and that the leaſt hurry is apt to diſorder the line of horſe to ſuch a degree, as would rob them of their proper effect, and render all their efforts abortive. This being the ſyſtem of lord George Sackville, it may deſerve conſideration, whether he could deviate from it on this delicate occaſion, without renouncing the dictates of his own judgement and diſcretion; and whether he was at liberty to uſe his own judgement, after having received the order to advance. After all, whether he was intentionally guilty, and what were the motives by which he was really actuated, are queſtions which his own conſcience alone can ſolve. Even granting him to have heſitated from perplexity, to have lingered from vexation, to have failed through error of judgement, he will probably find favour with the candid and humane part of his fellow-ſubjects, when they reflect upon the nature of his ſituation, placed at the head of ſuch a body of cavalry, uninſtructed and uninformed of plan or circumſtance, divided from the reſt of the army, unacquainted with the operations of the day, chagrined with doubt and diſappointment, and perplexed by contradictory orders, neither of which he could execute without offering violence to his own judgement; when they conſider the endeavours he uſed to manifeſt his obedience; the laſt diſtinct order which he in perſon received and executed: that mankind are liable to miſtakes; that the cavalry were not originally intended to act, as appears in the account of the battle, publiſhed at the Hague, by the authority of prince Ferdinand, expreſsly declaring that the cavalry on the right did not act, becauſe it was deſtined to ſuſtain the infantry in a third line; that if it had really been deſigned for action it ought either to have been poſted in another place, or permitted to advance ſtrait forwards by the windmill, according to the idea of its commander; finally, when they recal to view the general confuſion that ſeems to have prevailed through the manœuvres of that morning, and remember ſome particulars of the action; that the brigades of Britiſh artillery had no orders until they applied to lord George Sackville, who directed them to the ſpot where they acquitted themſelves with ſo much honour and effect, in contributing to the ſucceſs of the day; that the glory and advantage acquired by the few brigades of infantry, who may be ſaid to have defeated the whole French army, was in no reſpect owing to any general or particular orders or inſtructions, but entirely flowing from the native valour of the troops, and the ſpirited conduct of their immediate commanders; and that a great number of officers in the allied army, even thoſe who remained on the open heath, never ſaw the face of the enemy, or ſaw them at ſuch a diſtance, that they could not diſtinguiſh more than the hats and the arms of the Britiſh regiments with which they were engaged. With reſpect to the imputation of cowardice levelled at lord George by the unthinking multitude, and circulated with ſuch induſtry and clamour, we ought to conſider it as a mob-accuſation, which the braveſt of men, even the great duke of Marlborough, could not eſcape; we ought to receive it as a dangerous ſuſpicion, which ſtrikes at the root of character, and may blaſt that honour in a moment which the ſoldier has acquired in a long courſe of painful ſervice, at the continual hazard of his life; we ought to diſtruſt it as a malignant charge, altogether inconſiſtent with the former conduct of the perſon accuſed, as well as with his ſubſequent impatience and perſeverance in demanding a trial, to which he never would have been called; a trial which, though his life was at ſtake, and his cauſe out of countenance, he ſuſtained with ſuch courage, fortitude, and preſence of mind, as even his enemies themſelves could not help admiring. Thus have we given a ſuccinct detail of this remarkable affair, with that ſpirit of impartiality, that ſacred regard to truth which the importance of hiſtory demands. To the beſt of our recollection we have forgot no eſſential article of the accuſation, nor ſuppreſſed any material circumſtance urged in defence of lord George Sackville. Unknown to his perſon, unconnected with his friends, unmoved by fear, unbiaſſed by intereſt, we have candidly obeyed the dictates of juſtice, and the calls of humanity, in our endeavours to diſſipate the clouds of prejudice and miſapprehenſion, warmed, perhaps, with an honeſt diſdain at the ungenerous, and, in our opinion, unjuſt perſecution, which, previous to his trial, an officer of rank, ſervice, and character, the deſcendant of an illuſtrious family, the ſon of a nobleman univerſally reſpected, a Briton, a fellow-ſubject, had undergone.

The court-martial having examined the evidence, and heard the defence, gave judgement in theſe words: 'The court, upon due conſideration of the whole matter before them, is of opinion, that lord Gorge Sackville is guilty of having diſobeyed the orders of prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, whom he was, by his commiſſion and inſtructions, directed to obey as commander in chief, according to the rules of war, and it is the further opinion of this court, that the ſaid lord George Sackville is, and he his hereby adjudged, unfit to ſerve his majeſty in any military capacity whatſoever.' His ſentence was confirmed by the king, who moreover ſignified his pleaſure that it ſhould be given out in public order, not only in Britain, but in America, and every quarter of the globe where any Engliſh troops happened to be, that officers, being convinced that neither high birth nor great employments can ſhelter offences of ſuch a nature, and that ſeeing they are ſubject to cenſures much worſe than death to a man who has any ſenſe of honour, they may avoid the fatal conſequences ariſing from diſobedience of orders. To complete the diſgrace of this unfortunate general, his majeſty in council called for the council-book, and ordered the name of lord George Sackville to be ſtruc out of the liſt of privy-counſellors.

This ſummer was diſtinguiſhed by another trial, ſtill more remarkable. Laurence earl Ferrers, a nobleman of violent ſpirit, who had committed many outrages, and, in the opinion of all who knew him, given manifold proofs of inſanity, at length perpetrated a murder, which ſubjected him to the cognizance of juſtice. His deportment to his lady was ſo brutal, that application had been made to the houſe of peers, and a ſeparation effected by act of parliament. Truſtees were nominated; and one mr. Johnſon, who had, during the beſt part of his life, been employed in the family, was now appointed receiver of the eſtates, at the earl's own requeſt. The conduct of this man, in the courſe of his ſtewardſhip, gave umbrage to lord Ferrers, whoſe diſpoſition was equally jealous and vindictive. He imagined all his own family had conſpired againſt his intereſt, and that Johnſon was one of their accomplices; that he had been inſtrumental in obtaining the act of parliament, which his lordſhip conſidered as a grievous hardſhip; that he had diſappointed him in regard to a certain contract, about coal-mines; in a word, that there was a colluſion between Johnſon and the earl's adverſaries. Fired with theſe ſuppoſitions, he firſt expreſſed his reſentment, by giving Johnſon notice to quit the farm which he poſſeſſed on the eſtate; but finding the truſtees had confirmed the leaſe, he determined to gratify his revenge by aſſaſſination, and laid his plan accordingly. On Sunday the 13th of January he appointed this unhappy man to come to his houſe on the Friday following, in order to peruſe papers, or ſettle accounts; and Johnſon went thither without the leaſt ſuſpicion of what was prepared for his reception: for although he was no ſtranger to his lordſhip's dangerous diſpoſition, and knew he had ſome time before incurred his diſpleaſure, yet he imagined his reſentment had entirely ſubſided, as the earl had of late behaved to him with remarkable complacency. He, therefore, at the time appointed, repaired to his lordſhip's houſe of Stanton, in Leiceſterſhire, at the diſtance of a ſhort mile from his own habitation, and was admitted by a maid ſervant. The earl had diſmiſſed every perſon in the houſe, upon various pretences, except three women, who were left in the kitchen. Johnſon advancing to the door of his apartment was received by his lordſhip, who deſired him to walk into another room, where he joined him in a few minutes, and then the door was locked on the inſide. After a great deal of warm expoſtulation, the earl inſiſted upon his ſubſcribing a paper, acknowledging himſelf a villain; and on his refuſing to comply with this demand, declared he would put him to death. In vain the unfortunate man remonſtrated againſt this cruel injuſtice, and deprecated the indignation of this furious nobleman. He remained deaf to all his entreaties, drew forth a piſtol, which he had loaded for the purpoſe, and commanding him to implore heaven's mercy, on his knees, ſhot him through the body, while he remained in that ſupplicating attitude. The conſequence of this violence was not immediate death; but his lordſhip, ſeeing the wretched victim ſtill alive and ſenſible, though agonized with pain, felt a momentary motion of pity. He ordered his ſervants to convey mr. Johnſon up ſtairs to a bed, to ſend for a ſurgeon, and give immediate notice of the accident to the wounded man's family. When mr. Johnſon's daughter came to the houſe, ſhe was met by the earl, who told her he had ſhot her father on purpoſe, and with deliberation. The ſame declaration he made to the ſurgeon, on his arrival. He ſtood by him while he examined the wound, deſcribed the manner in which the ball had penetrated, and ſeemed ſurpriſed that it ſhould be lodged within the body. When he demanded the ſurgeon's opinion of the wound, the operator thought proper to temporiſe, for his own ſafety, as well as for the ſake of the public, leſt the earl ſhould take ſome other deſperate ſtep, or endeavour to eſcape. He, therefore, amuſed him with hopes of Johnſon's recovery, about which he now ſeemed extremely anxious. He ſupported his ſpirits by immoderate drinking, after having retired to another apartment with the ſurgeon, whom he deſired to take all poſſible care of his patient. He declared, however, that he did not repent of what he had done; that Johnſon was a villain, who deſerved to die; that, in caſe of his death, he (the earl) would ſurrender himſelf to the houſe of peers, and take his trial. He ſaid he could juſtify the action to his own conſcience; and owned his intention was to have killed Johnſon outright; but as he ſtill ſurvived, and was in pain, he deſired that all poſſible means might be uſed for his recovery. Nor did he ſeem altogether neglectful of his own ſafety; he endeavoured to tamper with the ſurgeon, and ſuggeſt what evidence he ſhould give when called before a court of juſtice. He continued to drink himſelf into a ſtate of intoxication, and all the cruelty of his hate ſeemed to return. He would not allow the wounded man to be removed to his own houſe, ſaying, he would keep him under his own roof, that he might plague the villain. He returned to the chamber where Johnſon lay, inſulted him with the moſt opprobrius language, threatened to ſhoot him through the head, and could hardly be reſtrained from committing further acts of violence on the poor man, who was already in extremity. After he retired to bed, the ſurgeon procured a ſufficient number of aſſiſtants, who conveyed mr. Johnſon in an eaſy-chair to his own houſe, where he expired that ſame morning in great agonies. The ſame ſurgeon aſſembled a number of armed men to ſeize the murderer, who at firſt threatened reſiſtance, but was ſoon apprehended, endeavouring to make his eſcape, and committed to the county priſon. From thence he was conveyed to London by the gaoler of Leiceſter, and conducted by the uſher of the black rod and his deputy into the houſe of lords, where the coroner's inqueſt, and affidavits touching the murder, being read, the gaoler delivered up his priſoner to the care of the black rod, and he was immediately committed to the Tower. He appeared very calm, compoſed, and unconcerned, from the time of his being apprehended; converſed cooly on the ſubject of his impriſonment; made very pertinent remarks upon the nature of the habeas corpus act of parliament, of which he hoped to avail himſelf; and when they withdrew from the houſe of peers, deſired he might not be viſited by any of his relations or acquaintances. His underſtanding, which was naturally good, had been well cultivated; his arguments were rational, but his conduct was frantic.

The circumſtances of this aſſaſſination appeared ſo cruel and deliberate, that the people cried aloud for vengeance; and the government gave up the offender to the juſtice of his country. The lord-keeper Henley was appointed lord high-ſteward for the trial of earl Ferrers, and ſat in ſtate with all the peers and judges in Weſtminſter-hall, which was for this purpoſe converted into a very auguſt tribunal. On the 16th day of April the delinquent was brought from the Tower in a coach, attended by the major of the Tower, the gentleman-gaoler, the wardours, and a detachment of the foot-guards. He was brought into court about ten; and the lord-ſteward with the peers taking their places, he was arraigned aloud in the midſt of an infinite concourſe of people, including many foreigners, who ſeemed wonderfully ſtruc with the magnificence and ſolemnity of the tribunal. The murder was fully proved by unqueſtionable evidence: but the earl pleaded inſanity of mind; and in order to eſtabliſh this plea, called many witneſſes to atteſt his lunacy in a variety of inſtances, which ſeemed too plainly to indicate a diſordered imagination: unfounded jealouſy of plots and conſpiracies, unconnected ravings, fits of muſing, incoherent ejaculations, ſudden ſtarts of fury, denunciations of unprovoked revenge, frantick geſticulations, and a ſtrange caprice of temper, were proved to have diſtinguiſhed his conduct and deportment, it appeared that lunacy had been a family taint, and affected divers of his lordſhip's relations; that a ſollicitor of reputation had renounced his buſineſs, on the full perſuaſion of his being diſordered in his brain; that, long before this unhappy event, his neareſt relations had deliberated upon the expediency of taking out a commiſſion of lunacy againſt him, and were prevented by no other reaſon then the apprehenſion of being convicted of ſcandalum magnatum, ſhould the jury find his lordſhip compos mentis; a circumſtance which in all probability would have happened, inaſmuch as the earl's madneſs did not appear in his converſation, but in his conduct. A phyſician of eminence, whoſe practice was confined to perſons labouring under this infirmity, declared that the particulars of the earl's deportment and perſonal behaviour ſeemed to indicate lunacy, indeed, all his neighbours and acquaintances had long conſidered him as a madman; and a certain noble lord declared in the houſe of peers when the bill of ſeparation was on the carpet, that he looked upon him in the light of a maniac; and that, if ſome effectual ſtep was not taken to diveſt him of the power of doing miſchief, he did not doubt but that one day they ſhould have occaſion to try him for murder. The lawyers who managed the proſecution in behalf of the crown endeavoured to invalidate the proofs of his lunacy, by obſerving, that his lordſhip was never ſo much deprived of his reaſon but that he could diſtinguiſh between good and evil; that the murder he had committed was the effect of revenge for a conceived injury of ſome time ſtanding; that the malice was deliberate, and the plan artfully conducted; that immediately after the deed was perpetrated the earl's converſation and reaſoning was cool and conſiſtent, until he drank himſelf into a ſtate of intoxication; that, in the opinion of the greateſt lawyers, no criminal can avail himſelf of the plea of lunacy, provided the crime was committed during a lucid interval: but his lordſhip, far from exhibiting any marks of inſanity, had, in the courſe of this trial, diſplayed uncommon underſtanding and ſagacity in examining the witneſſes, and making many ſhrewd and pertinent obſervations on the evidence which was given. Theſe ſentiments were conformable to the opinion of the peers, who unanimouſly declared him guilty.—After all, in examining the vicious actions of a man who has betrayed manifeſt and manifold ſymptoms of inſanity, it is not eaſy to diſtinguiſh thoſe which are committed during the lucid interval. The ſuggeſtions of madneſs are ofter momentery and tranſient: the determinations of a lunatic, though generally raſh and inſtantaneous, are ſometimes the reſult of artful contrivance; but there is alſo an abſurdity which is the criterion of the diſeaſe, either in the premiſes or concluſion. The earl, it is true, had formed a deliberate plan for the perpetration of the murder; but he had taken no precautions for his own ſafety or eſcape: and this neglect will the more plainly appear to have been the criterion of inſanity, if we reflect that he juſtified what he had done as a meritorious action; and declared he would, upon mr. Johnſon's death, ſurrender himſelf to the houſe of lords. Had he been impelled to this violence by a ſudden guſt of paſſion, it could not be expected that he ſhould have taken any meaſure for his own preſervation; but it was the execution of a deliberate ſcheme, and his lordſhip was by no means defective in pain of ingenuity, he might eaſily have contrived means for concealing the murder, until he ſhould have accompliſhed his eſcape; and, in our opinion, any other than a madman would either have taken ſome ſuch meaſures, or formed ſome plan for the concealment of his own guilt. The deſign itſelf ſeems to have been rather an intended ſacrifice to juſtice than a gratification of revenge. Neither do we think that the ſanity of his mind was aſcertained by the accuracy and deliberation with which he made his remarks, and examined the evidence at his trial. The influence of his phrenzy might by paſt; though it was no ſign of ſound reaſon to ſupply the proſecutor with ſuch an argument to his prejudice. Had his judgement been really unimpaired, he might have aſſumed the maſque of lunacy for his own preſervation.

The trial was continued for two days; and on the third the lord-ſteward, after having made a ſhort ſpeech touching the heinous nature of the offence, pronounced the ſame ſentence of death upon the earl which malefactors of the loweſt claſs undergo; that from the Tower, in which he was impriſoned, he ſhould on the Monday following, be led to the common place of execution, there to be hanged by the nec, and his body be afterwards diſſected and anatomized. This laſt part of the ſentence ſeemed to ſhoc the criminal extremely: he changed colour, his jaw quivered, and he appeared to be in great agitation; but during the remaining part of his life he behaved with ſurprizing compoſure, and even unconcern. After he had received ſentence, the lords his judges, by virtue of a power veſted in them, reſpited his execution for one month, that he might have time to ſettle his temporal and ſpiritual concerns. Before ſentence was paſſed, the earl read a paper, in which he begged pardon of their lordſhips for the trouble he had given, as well as for having, againſt his own inclination, pleaded lunacy at the requeſt of his friends. He thanked them for the candid trial with which he had been indulged, and entreated their lordſhips to recommend him to the king for mercy. He afterwards ſent a letter to his majeſty, remonſtrating, that he was the repreſentative, of a very ancient and honourable family, which had been allied to the crown; and requeſting, that if he could not be favoured with the ſpecies of death, which, in caſes of treaſon, diſtinguiſhes the nobleman from the plebian, he might at leaſt, out of conſideration for his family, be allowed to ſuffer in the Tower, rather than at the common place of execution; but this indulgence was refuſed. From his return to the Tower to the day of his execution he betrayed no mark of apprehenſion or impatience; but regulated his affairs with preciſion, and converſed without concern or reſtraint.

On the 5th day of May, his body being demanded by the ſheriffs at the Tower-gate, in conſequence of a writ under the great ſeal of England, directed to the lieutenant of the Tower, his lordſhip deſired permiſſion to go in his own landau, and appeared gaily dreſſed in a light-coloured ſuit of clothes, embroidered with ſilver. He was attended in the landau by one of the ſheriffs, and the chaplain of the Tower, followed by the chariots of the ſheriffs, a mourning-coach and ſix filled with his friends, and a hearſe for the conveyance of his body. He was guarded by a poſſe of conſtables, a party of horſe-grenadiers, and a detachment of infantry; and in this manner the proceſſion moved from the Tower, through an infinite concourſe of people, to Tyburn, where the gallows, and a ſcaffold erected under it, appeared covered with blac baiſe. The earl behaved with great compoſure to mr. Sheriff Vaillant, who attended him in the landau: he obſerved that the gaiety of his apparel might ſeem odd on ſuch an occaſion; but that he had particular reaſons for wearing that ſuit of clothes: he took notice of the vaſt multitude which crouded around him, brought thither, he ſuppoſed, by curioſity to ſee a nobleman hanged: he told the ſheriff he had applied to the king, by letter, that he might be permitted to die in the Tower, where the earl of Eſſex, one of his anceſtors, had been beheaded in the reign of queen Elizabeth; an application which, he ſaid, he had made with the more confidence, as he had the honour to quarter part of his majeſty's arms. He expreſſed ſome diſpleaſure at being executed as a common felon, expoſed to the eye of ſuch a multitude. The chaplain, who had never been admitted to him before, hinted that ſome account of his lordſhip's ſentiments on religion would be expected by the public, he made anſwer, that he did not think himſelf accountable to the public for his private ſentiments; that he had always adored one God, the creator of the univerſe: and with reſpect to any particular opinions of his own, he had never propagated them, or endeavoured to make proſelytes, becauſe he thought it was criminal to diſturb the eſtabliſhed religion of his country, as lord Bolingbroke had done, by the publication of his writings. He added, that the great number of ſects, and the multiplication of religious diſputes, had almoſt baniſhed morality. With regard to his crime for which he ſuffered, he declared that he had no malice againſt mr. Johnſon; and that the murder was owing to a perturbation of mind, occaſioned by a variety of croſſes and vexations. When he approached the place of execution, he expreſſed an earneſt deſire to ſee and take leave of a certain perſon who waited in a coach; a perſon for whom he entertained the moſt ſincere regard and affection: but the ſheriff prudently obſerving that ſuch an interview might ſhoc him, at a time when he had occaſion for all his fortitude and recollection, he acquieſced in the juſtneſs of the remark, and delivered to him a pocket-book, a ring and a purſe, deſiring they might be given to that perſon, whom he now declined ſeeing. On his arrival at Tyburn he came out of the landau, and aſcended the ſcaffold with a firm ſtep and undaunted countenance. He refuſed to join the chaplain in his devotion; but kneeling with him on blac cuſhions, he repeated the Lord's Prayer, which he ſaid, he had always admired; and added with great emergency, 'O Lord, forgive me all my errors, pardon all my ſins.' After this exerciſe, he preſented his watch to mr. Sheriff Vailant, thanked him and the other gentleman for all their civilities: and ſignified his deſire of being buried at Breden, or Stanton, in Leiceſterſhire. Finally, he gratified the executioner with a purſe of money: then the halter being adjuſted to his nec, he ſtepped upon a little ſtage, erected upon ſprings, on the middle of the ſcaffold, and the cap being pulled over his eyes, the ſheriff made a ſignal, at which the ſtage fell from under his feet, and he was left ſuſpended. His body, having hung an hour and five minutes, was cut down, placed in the hearſe, and conveyed to the public theatre for diſſection, where being opened, and lying for ſome days as the ſubject of a public lecture, at length it was carried off, and privately interred. Without all doubt, this unhappy nobleman's diſpoſition was ſo dangerouſly miſchievous, that it became neceſſary for the good of ſociety, either to confine him for life, as an incorrigible lunatic, or give him up at once as a ſacrifice to juſtice. Perhaps, it might be no abſurd nor unreaſonable regulation in the legiſlature, to diveſt all lunatics of the privilege of inſanity, and in caſes of enormity, ſubject them to the common penalties of the law; for though, in the eye of caſuiſtry, conſciouſneſs muſt enter into the conſtitution of guilt, the conſequences of murder committed by a meniac may be as pernicious to ſociety as thoſe of the moſt criminal and deliberate aſſaſſination: and the puniſhment of death can be hardly deemed unjuſt or rigorous, when inflicted upon a miſchievous being, diveſted of all the perceptions of reaſon and humanity. At any rate, as the nobility of England are raiſed by many illuſtrious diſtinctions above the level of plebeians, and as they are eminetly diſtinguſhed from them in ſuffering puniſhment for high-treaſon, which the law conſiders as the moſt atrocious crime that can be committed, it might not be unworthy of the notice of the legiſlature to deliberate whether ſome pre-eminence ought not to be extended to noblemen convicted of other crimes; in order to alleviate as much as poſſible the diſgrace of noble families; which have deſerved well of their contry; to avoid any circumſtances that may tend to diminiſh the luſtre of the Engliſh nobility in the eyes of foreign nations; or to bring it into contempt with the common people of our own, already too licentious, and prone to aboliſh thoſe diſtinctions which ſerve as the baſis of decorum, order, and ſubordination.

Homicide is the reproach of England: one would imagine there is ſomething in the climate of this country, that not only diſpoſes the natives of this inhuman outrage, but even infects foreigners who reſide among them. Certain it is, high paſſions will break out into the moſt enormous violences in that country where they are leaſt controuled by the reſtraint of regulation and diſcipline; and it is equally certain, that in no civilized country under the ſun there is ſuch a relaxation of diſcipline, either religious or civil, as in England. The month of Auguſt produced a remarkable inſtance of deſperate revenge, perpetrated by one Stirn, a native of Heſſe-Caſſel, inflamed and exaſperated by a falſe punctilio of honour. This unhappy young man was deſcended of a good family, and poſſeſſed many accompliſhments both of mind and perſon: but his character was diſtinguiſhed by ſuch a jealous ſenſibility, as rendered him unhappy in himſelf, and diſagreeable to his acquaintance, after having for ſome years performed the office of uſher in a boarding-ſchool, he was admitted to the houſe of one mr. Matthews, a ſurgeon, in order to teach him the claſſics, and inſtruct his children in muſic, which he perfectly underſtood, he had not long reſided in his family when the ſurgeon took umbrage at ſome part of his conduct taxed him roughly with fraud and ingratitude, and inſiſted upon his removing to another lodging. Wheather he rejected this intimation, or found difficulty in procuring another apartment, the ſurgeon reſolved to expel him by violence, called in the aſſiſtance of a peace-officer, and turned him out into the ſtreet in the night, after having loaded him with the moſt provoking reproaches. Theſe injuries and diſgraces operating upon a mind jealous by nature, and galled by adverſity, produced a kind of phrenzy of reſentment, and took the deſperate reſolution of ſacrificing mr. Matthews to his revenge. Next day, having provided a caſe of piſtols, and charged them for the occaſion, he re-enforced his rage by drinking an unuſual quantity of wine, and repaired in the evening to a public-houſe, which mr. Matthews frequented in the neighbourhood of Hatton-Garden. There he accordingly found the unhappy victim ſitting with ſome of his friends; and the ſurgeon, inſtead of paliating his former conduct, began to inſult him a freſh with the moſt opprobrious invectives. Stirn, exaſperated by this additional indignity, pulled his piſtols from his boſom, ſhot the ſurgeon, who immediately expired, and diſcharged the other at his own breaſt, though his confuſion was ſuch that it did not take effect. He was apprehended on the ſpot, and conveyed to priſon, where for ſome days, he refuſed all kind of ſuſtenance, but afterwards became more compoſed. At his trial he pleaded inſanity of mind; but being found guilty, he reſolved to anticipate the execution of the ſentence. That ſame evening he drank poiſon; and notwithſtanding all the remedies that could be adminiſtered, died in ſtrong convulſions. His body was publicly diſſected, according to the ſentence of the law, and afterwards interred with thoſe marks of indignity which are reſerved for the perpetrators of ſuicide.

We ſhall cloſe the domeſtic occurrences of this year with an account of two incidents, which, though of a very different nature in reſpect of each other, nevertheleſs concurred in demonſtrating that the internal wealth and vigour of the nation were neither drained nor diminiſhed by the enormous expence and inconveniencies of the war. The committee appointed to manage the undertaking for a new bridge over the river Thames at Black-Friars having received and examined a variety of plans preſented by different artiſts, at length gave the preference to the deſign of one mr. Mylne, a young architect, a native of North-Britain, juſt returned from the proſecution of his ſtudies at Rome, where he had gained the prize in the capital, which the academy of that city beſtows on him who produces the moſt beautiful and uſeful plan on a given ſubject of architecture. This young man being in London, on his return to his own country, was adviſed to declare himſelf a candidate for the ſuperintendency of the new bridge; and the plan which he preſented was approved and adopted. The place being already aſcertained, the lord-mayor of London attended by the committee, and a great concourſe of people, repaired to Black-Friars, and laid the firſt ſtone of the bridge, placing upon it a plate, with an inſcription, which does more honour to the public ſpirit of the undertakers than to the claſſical taſte of the author[f]. The other inſtance that denoted the wealth and ſpirit of the nation, was the indifference and unconcern with which they bore the loſs of a vaſt magazine of naval ſtores belonging to the dock-yard at Portſmouth, which, in the month of July, was ſet on fire by lightening, and conſiſting of combuſtibles, burned with ſuch fury, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of the workmen in the yard, the ſailors in the harbour, and the troops in the town, that before a ſtop was put to the conflagration, it had conſumed a variety of ſtores, to an immenſe value. The damage, however, was ſo immediately repaired, that it had no ſort of effect in diſconcerting any plan, or even in retarding any naval preparations.

How important theſe preparations muſt have been may be judged from the prodigious increaſe of the navy, which, at this juncture, amounted to 120 ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, fireſhips, ſloops, bombs, and tenders. Of theſe capital ſhips, 17 were ſtationed in the Eaſt-Indies, 20 for the defence of the Weſt-India iſlands, 12 in North-America, 10 in the Mediterranean, and 61, either on the coaſt of France, in the harbours of England, or cruiſing in the Engliſh ſeas for the protection of the Britiſh commerce. Notwithſtanding theſe numerous and powerful armaments, the enemy, who had not a ſhip of the line at ſea, were ſo alert with their ſmall privateers and armed veſſels, that, in the beginning of this year, from the 1ſt of March to the 10th of June, they had made prize of 200 veſſels belonging to Great-Britain and Ireland. The whole number of ſhips taken by them, from the 1ſt day of June, in the year 1756, to the 1ſt of June in the preſent year, amounted to 2539; of theſe 78 were privateers, 321 were re-taken, and about the ſame number ranſomed. In the ſame ſpace of time, the Britiſh cruiſers had made captures of 944 veſſels, including 242 privateers, many fiſhing boats and ſmall coaſters, the value of which hardly defrayed the expence of condemnation. That ſuch a ſmall proportion of ſhips ſhould be taken from the enemy is not at all ſurpriſing, when we conſider the terrible ſhocs their commerce had previouſly received, and the great number of their mariners impriſoned in England: but the prodigious number of Britiſh veſſels

[f] Ultimo die Octobris, anno ab incarnatione
MDCCLX,
Auſpicatiſſimo principe Georgio Tertio
Regnum jam inuente,
Pontis hujus, in reipublicæ commodum
Urbiſque majeſtatem
(Latè tum flagrante bello)
à S. P. Q. L. ſuſcepti, Primum lapidem poſuit
THOMAS CHITTY, miles,
Prætor,
ROBERTO MYLNE, architecto.
Utque apud poſteros extet monumentum
Voluntatis ſuæ erga virum,
Qui vigore ingenii, animi conſtantiâ,
Probitatis et virtutis ſuæ felici quâdam contagione, (Favente Deo, Fauſtiſq; Georgii Secundi auſpiciis!)
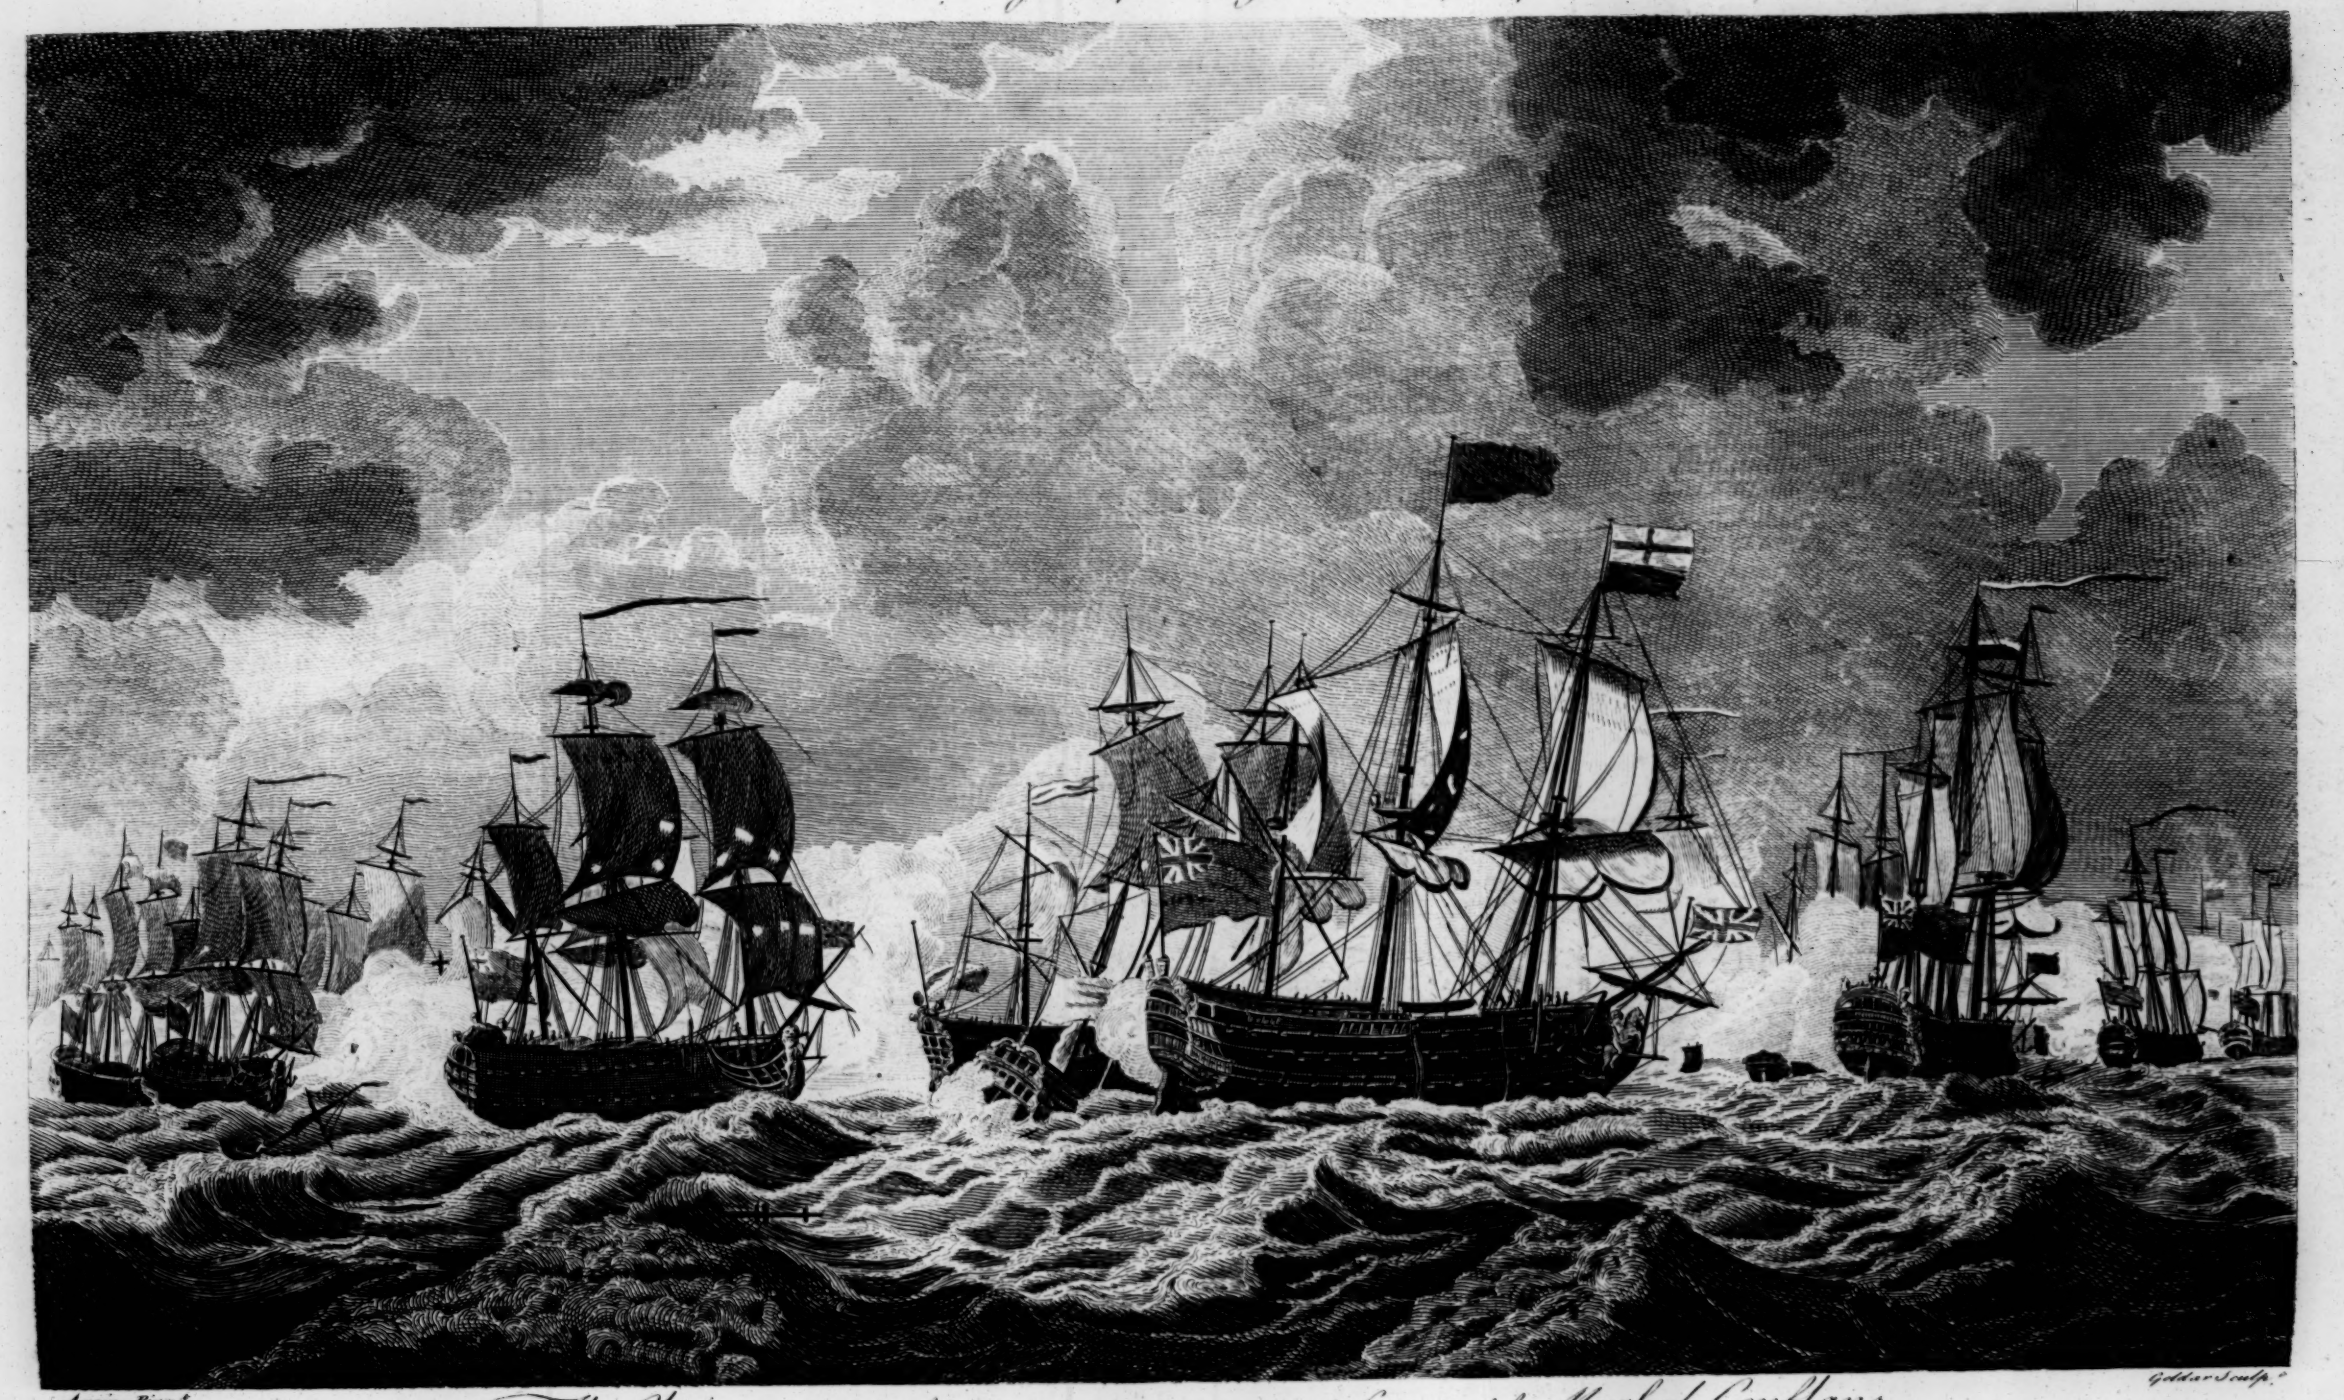
Imperium Britannicum
In Aſia, Africa, et America
Reſtituit, auxit, et ſtabilivit,
Nec non patriæ antiquum honorem et auctoritatem
Inter Europæ gentes inſtauravit,
Cives Londinenſes uno conſenſu
Huic ponti inſcribi voluerunt nomen
GULIELMI PITT.

BRITISH MUSEUM 15 JUN 20

London: Engravd for Harrisons Edition of Rapin.



Swain. Pinx.t

Goldar Sculp.o

The Glorious DEFEAT of the FRENCH FLEET, under the Command of Marshal Conflans, off Belle-Isle, on the 20 of November 1759, by a Fleet of HIS MAJESTYS SHIPS, under the Command of the Hon.ble Sr. Edward Hawke, Admiral of the Blue, & Knight of the most Hon.ble Order of the Bath, &c.
Whereby they were prevented Executing a Body of Troops to invade the British Dominions.

taken by their petty coaſting privateers, in the face of ſuch mighty armaments, numerous cruiſers, and convoys, ſeems to argue, that either the Engliſh ſhips of war were inactive or improperly diſpoſed, or that the merchants hazarded their ſhips without convoy. Certain it is in the courſe of this year we find fewer prizes taken from the enemy, and fewer exploits achieved at ſea, than we had occaſion to record in the annals of the paſt. Not that the preſent year is altogether barren of events which redound to the honour of our marine commanders. We have, in recounting the tranſactions of the preceding year, mentioned a ſmall armament equipped at Dunkirk, under the command of M. de Thurot, who, in ſpight of all the vigilance of the Britiſh commander ſtationed in the Downs, found means to eſcape from the harbour in the month of October laſt, and arrived at Gottenburgh, in Sweden, from whence he proceeded to Bergen, in Norway. His inſtructions were to make occaſional deſcents upon the coaſt of Ireland, and, by dividing the troops, and diſtracting the attention of the government in that kingdom, to facilitate the enterprize of M. de Conflans, the fate of which we have already narrated. The original armament of Thurot conſiſted of five ſhips, one of which, called the Mareſchal de Belleiſle, was mounted with 44 guns; the Begon, the Blond, the Terpſichore, had 30 guns each, and the Marante carried 24. The number of ſoldiers put on board this little fleet did not exceed 1270, excluſive of marines to the number of 700; but 200 of the troops were ſent ſic on ſhore, before the armament ſailed from Dunkirk; and in their voyage between Gottenburgh and Bergen they loſt company of the Begon, during a violent ſtorm. The ſeverity of the weather detained them 19 days at Bergen, at the expiration of which they ſet ſail for the weſtern iſlands of Scotland, and diſcovered the northern part of Ireland in the latter end of January. The intention of Thurot was to make a deſcent about Derry; but before this deſign could be executed, the weather growing tempeſtuous, and the wind blowing off ſhore, they were driven out to ſea, and in the night loſt ſight of the Marante, which never joined them in the ſequel. After having been tempeſt-beaten for ſome time, and expoſed to a very ſcanty allowance of proviſion, the officers requeſted of Thurot that he would return to France, leſt they ſhould all periſh by famine; but he lent a deaf ear to this propoſal, and frankly told them he could not return to France without having ſtruc ſome ſtroke for the ſervice of his country. Nevertheleſs in hopes of meeting with ſome refreſhment, he ſteered to the iſland of Iſla, where the troops were landed, and here they found blac cattle, and a ſmall ſupply of oatmeal, for which they paid a reaſonable price; and it muſt be owned, Thurot himſelf behaved with great moderation and generoſity.

While this ſpirited adventurer ſtruggled with theſe wants and difficulties, his arrival in thoſe ſeas filled the whole kingdom with alarm. Bodies of regular troops and militia were poſted along the coaſts of Ireland and Scotland; and beſides the ſquadron of commodore Boys, who ſailed to the northward on purpoſe to purſue the enemy, other ſhips of war were ordered to ſcour the Britiſh channel, and cruize between Scotland and Ireland. The weather no ſooner permitted Thurot to purſue his deſtination, than he ſailed from Iſla to the bay of Carrickfergus, in Ireland, and made all the neceſſary preparations for a deſcent; which was accordingly effected with 600 men, on the 21ſt day of February. Lieutenant-colonel Jennings, who commanded 4 companies of raw undiſciplined men at Carrickfergus, having received information that three ſhips had anchored about two miles and a half from the caſtle, which was ruinous and defenceleſs, immediately detached a party to make obſervations, and ordered the French priſoners there confined to be removed to Belfaſt. Mean while, the enemy landing without oppoſition, advanced towards the town, which they found as well guarded as the nature of the place, which was entirely open, and the circumſtances of the Engliſh commander, would allow. A regular attac was carried on, and a ſpirited defence made[g], until the ammunition of the Engliſh failed: then colonel Jennings retired in order to the caſtle, which, however, was in all reſpects untenable; for, beſides a breach in the wall near 50 feet wide, they found themſelves deſtitute of proviſion and ammunition. Nevertheleſs, they repulſed the aſſailants in their firſt attac even after the gate was burſt open, and ſupplied the want of ſhot with ſtones and rubbiſh. At length the colonel and his troops were obliged to ſurrender, on condition that they ſhould not be ſent priſoners to France, but be ranſomed, by ſending thither an equal number of French priſoners from Great-Britain or Ireland: that the caſtle ſhould not be demoliſhed, nor the town of Carrickfergus plundered or burned, on condition that the mayor and corporation ſhould furniſh the French troops with neceſſary proviſions. The enemy, after this exploit, did not preſume to advance farther into the country; a ſtep which indeed they could not have taken with any regard to their own ſafety; for by this time a conſiderable body of regular troops was aſſembled; and the people of the country manifeſted a laudable ſpirit of loyalty and reſolution, crowding in great numbers to Belfaſt, to offer their ſervice againſt the invaders. Theſe circumſtances, to which the enemy were no ſtrangers, and the defeat of Conflans, which they had alſo learned, obliged them to quit their conqueſt, and re-embark with ſome precipitation, after having laid Carrickfergus under moderate contribution.

The fate they eſcaped on ſhore they ſoon met with at ſea. Captain John Elliot, who commanded three frigates at Kinſale, and had, in the courſe of this war, more than once already diſtinguiſhed himſelf, even in his early youth, by extraordinary acts of valour, was informed by a diſpatch from the duke of Bedford, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, that three of the enemy's ſhips lay at anchor in the bay of Carrickfergus, and thither he immediately ſhaped his courſe in the ſhip Æolus, accompanied by the Pallas and Brilliant, under the command of the captains Clements and Logie. On the 28th day of February they deſcried the enemy, and gave chaſe, in ſight of the iſle of Mann; and about nine in the morning, captain Elliot, in his own ſhip, engaged the Belleiſle, commanded by Thurot, although conſiderably his ſuperior in ſtrength of men, number of guns, and weight of metal. In a few minutes his conſorts were alſo engaged with the other two ſhips of the enemy. After a warm action, maintained with great ſpirit on all ſides for an hour and a half, captain Elliot's lieutenant boarded the Belleiſle, and ſtriking her colours with his own hand, the commander ſubmitted: his example was immediately followed by the French captains, and the Engliſh commodore, taking poſſeſſion of his prizes, conveyed them into the bay of Ramſay, in the iſle of Mann, that their damage might be repaired. Though the Belleiſle was very leaky, and had loſt her boltſpit, mizen-maſt, and main-yard, in all probability the victory would not have been ſo eaſily obtained, had not the gallant Thurot fallen during the action. The victor had not even the conſolation to perform the laſt offices to his brave enemy; for his body was thrown into the ſea by his own people in the hurry of the engagement. The loſs on the ſide of the Engliſh did not exceed 40 men killed and wounded, whereas above 300 of the enemy were ſlain or diſabled. The ſervice performed on this occaſion was deemed ſo eſſential to the peace and commerce of Ireland, that the thanks of the houſe of commons in that kingdom were voted to the conquerors of Thurot, as well as to lieutenant-colonel Jennings, for his ſpirited behaviour at Carrickfergus; and the freedom of the city of Cork was preſented in ſilver boxes to the captains Elliot, Clements, and Logie. The name of Thurot was become terrible to all the trading ſea-ports of Great-Britain and Ireland; and therefore the defeat and capture of his ſquadron were celebrated with as hearty rejoicings as the moſt important victory could have produced.

In the beginning of April another engagement between four frigates, ſtill more equally matched, had a different iſſue, though not leſs honourable for the Britiſh commanders. Captain Skinner, of the Biddeford, and captain Kennedy, of the Flamborough, both frigates, ſailed on a cruize from Liſbon; and on the 4th day of April fell in with two large French frigates, convoy to a fleet of merchant-ſhips, which the Engliſh captains immediately reſolved to engage. The enemy did not decline the battle, which began about half an hour after ſix in the evening, and raged with great fury till eleven. By this time the Flamborough had loſt ſight of the Biddeford, and the frigate with which captain Kennedy was engaged bore away with all the ſail ſhe could carry. He purſued her till noon the next day, when ſhe had left him ſo far a-ſtern, that he loſt ſight of her, and returned to Liſbon, with the loſs of 15 men killed and wounded, including the lieutenant of marines, and conſiderable damage both in her hull and rigging. In three days he was joined by the Biddeford, which had alſo compelled her antagoniſt to give way, and purſued her till ſhe was out of ſight. In about an hour after the action began, captain Skinner was killed by a cannon-ball, and the command devolved to lieutenant Knollis, ſon to the earl of Banbury[h], who maintained the battle with great ſpirit, even after he was wounded, until he received a ſecond ſhot in his body, which proved mortal. Then the maſter aſſuming the direction, continued the engagement with equal reſolution, until the enemy made his eſcape, which he the more eaſily accompliſhed, as the Biddeford was diſabled in her maſts and rigging.

[g] One circumſtance that attended this diſpute deſerves to be tranſmitted to poſterity, as an inſtance of that courage, mingled with humanity, which conſtitutes true heroiſm. While the French and Engliſh were hotly engaged in one of the ſtreets, a little child ran playfully between them, having no idea of the danger to which it was expoſed: a common ſoldier of the enemy, perceiving the life of this poor innocent at ſtake, grounded his piece, advanced deliberately between the lines of fire, took up the child in his arms, conveyed it to a place of ſafety; then returning to his place, reſumed his muſket and renewed his hoſtility.

The bravery of five Iriſhmen and a boy, belonging to the crew of a ſhip from Waterford, deſerves commemoration. The veſſel, in her return from Bilboa, laden with brandy and iron, being taken by a French privateer off Uſhant, about the middle of April, the captors removed the maſter, and all the hands but theſe five men and the boy, who were left to aſſiſt nine Frenchmen in navigating the veſſel to France. The ſtout Hibernians immediately formed a plan of inſurrection, and executed it with ſucceſs. Four of the French mariners being below dec, three aloft among the rigging, one at the helm, another walking the dec, Brian, who headed the enterprize, tripped up the heels of the French ſteerſman, ſeiſed his piſtol, and diſcharged it at him who walked the dec, but miſſing the mark, he knocked him down with the butt-end of the piece. At the ſame time hollowing to his confederates below, they aſſailed the enemy with their own broad ſwords, and ſoon compelling them to ſubmit, came upon dec, and ſhut the hatches. Brian being now in poſſeſſion of the quarter dec, thoſe who were aloft called for quarter, and ſurrendered without oppoſition. The Iriſh having thus obtained a complete victory, almoſt without bloodſhed, and ſecured the priſoners, another difficulty occurred: neither Brian nor any of his aſſociates could read or write, or knew the leaſt principle of navigation; but ſuppoſing his courſe to be north, he ſteered at venture, and the firſt land he made was the neighbourhood of Youghall, where he happily arrived with his priſoners.

The only conſiderable damage ſuſtained by the navy of Great-Britain, ſince the commencement of this year, was the loſs of the Ramillies, a magnificent ſhip of the ſecond rate, belonging to the ſquadron which admiral Boſcawen commanded on the coaſt of France, in order to watch the motions and diſtreſs the commerce of that reſtleſs, enterprizing enemy. In the beginning of February a ſeries of ſtormy weather obliged the admiral to return from the bay of Quiberon to Plymouth, where he arrived with much difficulty; but the Ramillies overſhot the entrance to the Sound, and being embayed near a point called the Bolthead, about four leagues higher up the channel, was daſhed in pieces among the rocs, after all her anchors and cables had given way. All her officers and men, amounting to 700, periſhed on this occaſion, except one midſhipman and 25 mariners, who had the good fortune to ſave themſelves by leaping on the rocs as the hull was thrown forwards, and raiſed up by the ſucceeding billows. Such were the moſt material tranſactions of the year relating to the Britiſh empire in the ſeas of Europe.

We ſhall know tranſport the reader to the continent of North-America, which, as the theatre of war, ſtill maintained its former importance. The French emiſſaries from the province of Louiſiana had exerciſed their arts of inſinuation with ſuch ſucceſs among the Cherokees, a numerous and powerful nation of Indians, ſettled on the confines of Virginia and Carolina, that they had infringed the peace with the Engliſh towards the latter end of the laſt year, and begun hoſtilities, by plundering, maſſacring, and ſcalping ſeveral Britiſh ſubjects of the more ſouthern provinces. Mr Lyttelton, governor of South-Carolina, having received information of theſe outrages, obtained the neceſſary aids from the aſſembly of his province, for maintaining a conſiderable body of forces, which was raiſed with great expedition. He marched in the beginning of October, at the head of 800 provincials, re-enforced with 300 regular troops, and penetrated into the heart of the country poſſeſſed by the Cherokees, who were ſo much intimidated by his vigour and diſpatch, that they ſent a deputation of their chiefs to ſue for peace, which was reeſtabliſhed by a new treaty, dictated by the Engliſh governor. They obliged themſelves to renounce the French intereſt; to deliver up all the ſpies and emiſſaries of that nation then reſident among them; to ſurrender to juſtice thoſe of their own people who had been concerned in murdering and ſcalping the Britiſh ſubjects; and for the performance of theſe articles 22 of their head men were put as hoſtages into the hands of the governor. So little regard, however, was paid by theſe ſavages to this ſolemn accommodation, that mr. Lyttelton had been returned but a few days from their country, when they attempted to ſurpriſe the Engliſh fort Prince-George, near the the frontiers of Carolina, by going thither in a body, on pretence of delivering up ſome murderers; but the commanding officer perceiving ſome ſuſpicious circumſtances in their behaviour, acted with ſuch vigilance and circumſpection as entirely fruſtrated their deſign[i]. Thus diſappointed, they wreaked their vengeance upon the Engliſh ſubjects trading in their country, all of whom they butchered without mercy. Not contented with this barbarous ſacrifice, they made incurſions to the Britiſh ſettlements at the Long Lanes, and the forks of the Broad-River, and maſſacred about 40 defenceleſs coloniſts, who repoſed themſelves in full ſecurity on the peace ſo lately ratified. As views of intereſt could not have induced them to act in this manner, and their revenge had not been inflamed by any freſh provocation, theſe violences muſt be imputed to the inſtigation of French incendiaries; and too plainly evinced the neceſſity of crowning our American conqueſts with the reduction of Louiſiana, from whence theſe emiſſaries were undoubtedly diſpatched.

The cruelty and miſchief with which the Cherokees proſecuted their renewed hoſtilities, alarmed all the ſouthern colonies of the Engliſh; and application was made for aſſiſtance to mr. Amherſt, the commander in chief of the king's forces in America. He forthwith detached 1200 choſen men to South-Carolina, under the command of colonel Montgomery, brother to the earl of Eglinton, an officer of approved conduct, and diſtinguiſhed gallantry. Immediately after his arrival at Charles-Town, he advanced to Ninety-ſix, and proceeded to Twelve-mile-River, which he paſſed in the beginning of June, without oppoſition. He continued his rout by forced marches, until he arrived in the neighbourhood of the Indian town called Little Keowee, where he encamped in an advantageous ſituation. Having reaſon to believe the enemy were not yet appriſed of his coming, he reſolved to ruſh upon them in the night by ſurpriſe. With this view, leaving his tents

[h] Five ſons of this nobleman were remarkably diſtinguiſhed in this war. The fourth and fifth were dangerouſly wounded at the battle of Minden: the ſecond was hurt in the reduction of Guadaloupe: lord Wallingworth, the eldeſt, received a ſhot at Carrickfergus; and the third was ſlain in this engagement.

[i] This attempt was conducted in the following manner, having doubtleſs been concerted with the 22 hoſtages who reſided in the fort. On the 16th day of February, two Indian women appearing at Keowee, on the other ſide of the river, mr. Dogharty, one of the officers of the fort, went out to aſk them what news. While he was engaged in converſation with theſe females, the great Indian warrior Ocunnaſtota joining them, deſired he would call the commanding officer, to whom, he ſaid, he had ſomething to propoſe. Accordingly, lieutenant Cotymore appearing, accompanied by enſign Bell, Dogharty, and Foſter the interpreter, Ocunnaſtota told him he had ſomething of conſequence to impart to the governor, whom he purpoſed to viſit, and deſired he might be attended by a white man, as a ſafe-guard. The lieutenant aſſuring him he ſhould have a ſafeguard, the Indian declared he would then go and catch a horſe for him; ſo ſaying, he ſwung a bridle thrice over his head, as a ſignal, and immediately 25 or 30 muſquets, from different ambuſcades, were diſcharged at the Engliſh officers. Mr Cotymore received a ſhot in his left breaſt, and in a few days expired; mr. Bell was wounded in the calf of the leg, and the interpreter in the buttoc. Enſign Milne, who remained in the fort, was no ſooner informed of this treachery, than he ordered the ſoldiers to ſhackle the hoſtages; in the execution of which order one man was killed upon the ſpot, and another wounded in the forehead with a Tomohawk: circumſtances which, added to the murder of the lieutenant, incenſed the garriſon to ſuch a degree, that it was judged abſolutely neceſſary to put the hoſtages to death without further heſitation. In the evening a party of Indians approaching the fort, and firing two ſignal pieces, cried aloud in the Cherokee language, 'Fight manfully, and you ſhall be aſſiſted.' Then they began an attac, and continued firing all night upon the fort, without doing the leaſt execution. That a deſign was concerted between them and the hoſtages appeared plainly from the nature of this aſſault; and this ſuppoſition was converted into a certainty next day, when ſome of the garriſon ſearching the apartment in which the hoſtages lay, found a bottle of poiſon, probably deſigned to be emptied into the well, and ſeveral tomohawks buried in the earth; which weapons had been privately conveyed to them by their friends, who were permitted to viſit them without interruption. On the 3d day of March, the fort at Ninety-ſix was attacked by 200 Cherokee Indians with muſquetry, which had little or no effect, ſo that they were forced to retire with ſome loſs, and revenged themſelves on the open country, burning and ravaging all the houſes and plantations belonging to Engliſh ſettlers in this part of the country, and all along the frontiers of Virginia. Not contented with pillaging and deſtroying the habitations, they wantoned in the moſt horrible barbarities; and their motions were ſo ſecret and ſudden, that it was impoſſible for the inhabitants to know where the ſtorm would burſt, or take proper precautions for their own defence, ſo that a great number of the bac ſettlements were totally abandoned.

ſtanding, with a ſufficient guard for the camp and waggons, he marched through the woods towards the Cherokee town of Eſtatoe, at the diſtance of 25 miles; and in his rout detached a company of light infantry to deſtroy the village of Little Keowee, where they were received with a ſmart fire, but they ruſhed in with their bayonets, and all the men were put to the ſword. The main body proceeded ſtraight to Eſtatoe, which they reached in the morning, but it had been abandoned about half an hour before their arrival. Some few of the Indians, who had not time to eſcape, were ſlain; and the town, conſiſting of 200 houſes, well ſtored with proviſion, ammunition, and all the neceſſaries of life, was firſt plundered, and then reduced to aſhes; ſome of the wretched inhabitants who concealed themſelves periſhing in the flames. It was neceſſary to ſtrike terror into thoſe ſavages by ſome examples of ſeverity; and the ſoldiers became deaf to all the ſuggeſtions of mercy, when they found in one of the Indian towns the body of an Engliſhman, whom they had put to the torture that very morning. Colonel Montgomery followed his blow with ſurpriſing rapidity. In the ſpace of a few hours he deſtroyed Sugar-town, which was as large as Eſtatoe, and every village and houſe in the Lower Nation. The Indian villages in this part of the world were agreeably ſituated, generally conſiſting of about 100 houſes, neatly and commodiouſly built, and well ſupplied with proviſion. They had in particular large magazines of corn, which were conſumed in the flames. All the men that were taken ſuffered immediate death; but the greater part of the nation had eſcaped with the utmoſt precipitation. In many houſes the beds were yet warm, and the tables ſpread with victuals. Many loaded guns went off while the houſes were burning. The ſavages had not time to ſave their moſt valuable effects. The ſoldiers found ſome money, three or four watches, a good quantity of wampum, clothes, and peltry. Colonel Montgomery having thus taken vengeance on the perfidious Cherokees, at the expence of five or ſix men killed or wounded, returned to Fort Prince George, with about forty Indian women and children whom he had made priſoners. Two of their warriors were ſet at liberty, and deſired to inform their nation, that, though they were now in the power of the Engliſh, they might ſtill, on their ſubmiſſion, enjoy the bleſſings of peace. As the chief, called Attakullakulla, alias the Little Carpenter, who had ſigned the laſt treaty, diſapproved of the proceedings of his countrymen, and had done many good offices to the Engliſh ſince the renovation of the war, he was now given to underſtand that he might come down with ſome other chiefs to treat of an accommodation, which would be granted to the Cherokees on his account; but that the negotiation muſt be begun in a few days, otherwiſe all the towns in the Upper Nation would be ravaged, and reduced to aſhes.

Theſe intimations having produced little or no effect, colonel Montgomery reſolved to make a ſecond irruption into the middle ſettlements of the Cherokees, and began his march on the 24th day of June. On the 27th captain Morriſon, of the advanced party, was killed by a ſhot from a thicket, and the firing became ſo troubleſome that his men gave way. The grenadiers and light infantry being detached to ſuſtain them, continued to advance, notwithſtanding the fire from the woods, until, from a riſing ground, they diſcovered a body of the enemy. Theſe they immediately attacked, and obliged to retire into a ſwamp, which, when the reſt of the troops came up, they were, after a ſhort reſiſtance, compelled to abandon: but as the country was difficult, and the path extremely narrow, the forces ſuffered on their march from the fire of ſcattered parties, who concealed themſelves behind trees and buſhes. At length they arrived at the town of Etchowee, which the inhabitants had forſaken after having removed every thing of value. Here, while the army encamped on a ſmall plain, ſurrounded by hills, it was incommoded by vollies from the enemy, which wounded ſome men and killed ſeveral horſes. They were even ſo daring as to attac the piquet-guard, which repulſed them with difficulty; but, generally ſpeaking, their parties declined an open engagement. Colonel Montgomery, ſenſible that as many horſes were killed or diſabled, he could not proceed farther without leaving his proviſions behind, or abandoning the wounded men to the brutal revenge of a ſavage enemy, reſolved to return, and began his retreat in the night, that he might be the leſs diſturbed by the Indians. Accordingly, he purſued his rout for two days without interruption; but afterwards ſuſtained ſome ſtraggling fires from the woods, though the parties of the enemy were put to flight as often as they appeared. In the beginning of July he arrived at Fort Prince George; this expedition having coſt about 70 men killed and wounded, including five officers.

In revenge for theſe calamities, the Cherokees aſſembled to a conſiderable number, and formed the blocade of Fort Loudon, a ſmall fortification near the confines of Virginia, defended by an inconſiderable garriſon, ill ſupplied with proviſion and neceſſaries. After having ſuſtained a long ſiege, and being reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs, captain Demere, the commander, held a council of war with the other officers, to deliberate upon their preſent ſituation; when it appeared that their proviſions were entirely exhauſted; that they had ſubſiſted a conſiderable time, without bread, upon horſe-fleſh, and ſuch ſupplies of pork and beans as the Indian women could introduce by ſtealth; that the men were ſo weakened with famine and fatigue, that in a little time they would not be able to do duty; that, for two nights paſt, conſiderable parties had deſerted, and ſome thrown themſelves upon the mercy of the enemy; that the garriſon in general threatened to abandon their officers, and betake themſelves to the woods; and that there was no proſpect of relief, their communication having been long cut off from all the Britiſh ſettlements; for theſe reaſons they were unanimouſly of opinion, that it was impracticable to prolong their defence; that they ſhould accept of an honourable capitulation; and captain Stuart ſhould be ſent to treat with the warriors, and head men of the Cherokees, about the condition of their ſurrender. This officer, being accordingly diſpatched with full powers, obtained a capitulation of the Indians, by which the garriſon was permitted to retire. The Indians deſired, that when they arrived at Keowee the Cherokee priſoners confined at that place ſhould be releaſed, all hoſtilities ceaſe, a laſting accommodation be re-eſtabliſhed, and a regulated trade revived. In conſequence of this treaty the garriſon evacuated the fort, and had marched about 15 miles on their return to Carolina, when they were ſurrounded and ſurpriſed by a large body of Indians, who maſſacred all the officers, except captain Stuart, and ſlew 25 of the ſoldiers: the reſt were made priſoners, and diſtributed among the different towns and villages of the nation. Captain Stuart owed his life to the generous interceſſion of the Little Carpenter, who ranſomed him at the price of all he could command, and conducted him ſafe to Holſton River, where he found major Lewis advanced ſo far with a body of Virginians. The ſavages, encouraged by their ſucceſs at Fort Loudon, undertook the ſiege of Ninety-ſix, and other ſmall fortifications; but retired precipitately on the approach of a body of provincials.

In the mean time, the Britiſh intereſt and empire were firmly eſtabliſhed on the banks of the Ohio, by the prudence and conduct of major-general Stanwix, who had paſſed the winter at Pittſburgh, formerly Du Queſne, and employed that time in the moſt effectual manner for the ſervice of his country. He repaired the old works, eſtabliſhed poſts of communication from the Ohio to the Monongahela, mounted the baſtions that cover the iſthmus with artillery, erected caſemates, ſtore-houſes, and barracs for a numerous garriſon, and cultivated with equal diligence and ſucceſs the friendſhip and alliance of the Indians. The happy conſequences of theſe meaſures were ſoon apparent in the production of a conſiderable trade between the natives and the merchants of Pittſburgh, and in the perfect ſecurity of about 4000 ſettlers, who now returned to the quiet poſſeſſion of the lands from whence they had been driven by the enemy on the frontiers of Pennſylvania, Maryland, and Virginia.

The incidents of the war were much more important and deciſive in the more northern parts of this great continent. The reader will remember that brigadier-general Murray was left to command the garriſon of Quebeck, amounting to about 6000 men; that a ſtrong ſquadron of ſhips was ſtationed at Halifax, in Nova-Scotia, under the direction of lord Colvil, an able and experienced officer, who had inſtructions to reviſit Quebeck in the beginning of ſummer, as ſoon as the river St. Laurence ſhould be navigable; and that general Amherſt, the commander in chief of the forces in America, wintered in New-York, that he might be at hand to aſſemble his troops in the ſpring, and recompence his operations for the entire reduction of Canada. General Murray neglected no ſtep that could be taken by the moſt vigilant officer for maintaining the important conqueſt of Quebeck, and ſubduing all the Lower Canada, the inhabitants of which actually ſubmitted, and took the oath of allegiance to the king of Great-Britain[k]. The garriſon, however, within the walls of Quebeck, ſuffered greatly from the exceſſive cold in the winter, and the want of vegetables and freſh proviſion, inſomuch that, before the end of April, 1000 ſoldiers were dead of the ſcurvy, and twice that number rendered unfit for ſervice. Such was the ſituation of the garriſon, when mr. Murray received undoubted intelligence that the French commander, the chevalier de Levis, was employed in aſſembling his army, which had been cantoned in the neighbourhood of Montreal; that from the inhabitants of the country he had completed his eight battalions, regimented 40 companies of the troops de Colonie, and determined to undertake the ſiege of Quebeck, whenever the river St. Laurence ſhould be clear of ice, that he could uſe his four frigates, and other veſſels, by means of which he was entirely maſter of the river.

The brigadier, conſidering the city of Quebeck as no other than a ſtrong cantonment, had projected a plan of defence, by extending lines, and entrenching his troops on the heights of Abraham, which, at the diſtance of 800 paces, entirely command the ramparts of the city, and might have been defended by a ſmall force againſt a formidable army. Faſcines, and every other neceſſary for this work, had been provided, and in the month of April the men were ſet at work upon the projected lines; but the earth was ſo hardened by the froſt, that it was found impracticable to proceed. Being informed, that the night of the 26th, the enemy had landed at Point au Tremble, to the number of 10,000 men, with 500 ſavages, he ordered all the bridges over the river Cagrouge to be broke down, ſecured the landing-place at Sylleri and the Foulon, and next day, marching in perſon with a ſtrong detachment and two field-pieces, took poſſeſſion of an advantageoue ſituation, and thus defeated the ſcheme which the French commander had laid for cutting off the poſts which the Engliſh had eſtabliſhed. Theſe being all withdrawn, the brigadier that ſame afternoon marched bac to Quebeck, with little or no loſs, although his rear was haraſſed by the enemy. Here he formed a reſolution which hath been cenſured by ſome criticks in war, as a meaſure that favoured more of youthful impatience, and overboiling courage, than of that military diſcretion which ought to diſtinguiſh a commander in ſuch a delicate ſituation; but it is more eaſy to cenſure with an appearance of reaſon, than to act in ſuch circumſtances with any certainty of ſucceſs. Mr Murray, in his letter to the ſecretary of ſtate, declared, that although the enemy were greatly ſuperior to him in number, yet, when he conſidered that the Engliſh forces were habituated to victory, that they were provided with a fine train of field artillery, that, in ſhutting them at once within the walls, he ſhould have riſked his whole ſtake on the ſingle chance of defending a wretched fortification; a chance which could be much leſſened by an action in the field, though ſuch an action would double the chance of ſucceſs; for theſe reaſons he determined to hazard a battle; ſhould the event prove unproſperous, he reſolved to hold out the place to the laſt extremity; then to retreat to the iſle of Orleans, or Coudres, with the remainder of the garriſon, and there wait for a re-enforcement. In purſuance of theſe reſolutions he gave the neceſſary orders over night, and on the 28th day of April, at half an hour after ſix in the morning, marched out with his little army of 3000 men, which he formed on the heighths in order of battle. The right brigade, commanded by colonel Burton, conſiſted of the regiments of Amherſt, Anſtruther, Webb, and the ſecond battalion of royal Americans: the left, under colonel Fraſer was formed of the regiments of Kennedy, Laſcelles, Townſhend, and the Highlanders. Otway's regiment, and the third battalion of royal Americans, conſtituted the corps de reſerve. Major Dalling's corps of light infantry covered the right flank; the left was ſecured by captain Huzzen's company of rangers, and 100 volunteers, under the command of captain Donald Macdonald; and each battalion was ſupplied with two field-pieces. Brigadier Murray having reconnoitred the enemy, perceived their van had taken poſſeſſion of the riſing grounds about three quarters of a mile in his front; but that their army was on the march in one column. Thinking this was the critical moment to attac them before they were formed, he advanced towards them with equal order and expedition. They were ſoon driven from the heighths, though not without a warm diſpute, during which the body of their army advanced at a round pace, and formed in columns. Their van conſiſted of 10 companies of grenadiers, two of volunteers, and 400 ſavages: 8 battalions, formed in 4 columns, with ſome bodies of Canadians in the intervals, conſtituted their main body: their rear was compoſed of two battalions, and ſome Canadians in the flanks; and 2000 Canadians formed the reſerve. Their whole army amounted to upwards of 12,000 men. Major Dalling, with great gallantry, diſpoſſeſſed their grenadiers of a houſe and windmill which they occupied, in order to cover their left flanks; and in this attac the major and ſome of his officers were wounded: nevertheleſs, the light infantry purſued the fugitives to a corps which was formed to ſuſtain them; then the purſuers halted, and diſperſed along the front of the right; a circumſtance which prevented that wing from taking advantage of the firſt impreſſion they had made on the left of the enemy. The light infantry being ordered to regain the flank, were, in attempting this motion furiouſly charged, and thrown into diſorder: then they retired to the rear in ſuch a ſhattered condition, that they could never again be brought up during the whole action. Otway's regiment was inſtantly ordered to advance from the body of reſerve, and ſuſtain the right wing, which the enemy twice in vain attempted to penetrate. Mean while the left brigade of the Britiſh forces did not remain inactive: they had diſpoſſeſſed the French of two redoubts, and ſuſtained with undaunted reſolution the whole efforts of the enemy's right, until they were fairly fought down, overpowered by numbers, and reduced to a handful, notwithſtanding the aſſiſtance they received from the third battalion of royal Americans, which had been ſtationed with the body of reſerve, as well as from Kennedy's regiment, poſted in the centre. The French attacked with great impetuoſity; and, at length, a freſh column of the regiment de Rouſſillon penetrating the left wing of the Britiſh army, it gave way; the diſorder was ſoon communicated to the right, ſo that after a very obſtinate diſpute, which laſted an hour and three quarters, brigadier Murray was obliged to quit the field, with the loſs of 100 men killed or wounded, and the greater part of his artillery. The enemy left twice the number of men, and reaped no eſſential advantage from their victory.

Mr Murray, far from being diſperited by his defeat, no ſooner retired within the walls of Quebeck, than he reſolved to proſecute the fortifications of the place, which had been interrupted by the ſeverity of the winter; and the ſoldiers exerted themſelves with incredible alacrity, not only in labouring at the works, but alſo in the defence of the town, before which the enemy had opened trenches on the very evening of the battle. Three ſhips anchored at the [k] The garriſon of Quebeck, during the winter, repaired above 500 houſes, which had been damaged by the Engliſh cannon, built eight redoubts of wood, raiſed foot-banks along the ramparts, opened embraſures, mounted artillery, blocked up all the avenues of the ſuburbs with a ſtockade, removed 11 months proviſions into the higheſt part of the city, and formed a magazine of 4000 faſcines. Two hundred men were poſted at St. Foix, and twice the number at Lorette. Several hundred men marched to St. Auguſtin, brought off the enemy's advanced guard, with a great number of cattle, and diſarmed the inhabitants. By theſe precautions the motions of the French were obſerved, the avenues of Quebeck were covered, and their dominion ſecured over 11 pariſhes, which furniſhed them with ſome freſh proviſion and other neceſſaries for ſubſiſtence. Sixteen thouſand cords of wood being wanted for the hoſpitals, guards, and quarters, and the method of tranſporting it from the iſle of Orleans being found ſlow and difficult, on account of the floating ice in the river, a ſufficient number of hand-ſledges were made, and 200 wood-fellers ſet at work in the foreſt of St. Foix, where plenty of fuel was obtained, and brought into the ſeveral regiments by the men that were not upon duty. A detachment of 200 men, being ſent to the other ſide of the river, diſarmed the inhabitants, and compelled them to take the oath of allegiance: by this ſtep the Engliſh became maſters of the ſouthern ſide of the St. Laurence, and were ſupplied with good quantities of freſh proviſion. The advanced poſts of the enemy were eſtabliſhed at Point au Tremble, St. Auguſtin, and Le Calvaire; the main body of their army quartered between Trois Rivieres, and Jaques Quartier. Their general having formed the deſign of attacking Quebeck in the winter, began to provide ſnow ſhoes or rackets, ſcaling-ladders and facines, and make all the neceſſary preparations for that enterprize. He took poſſeſſion of Point Levi, where he formed a magazine of proviſions, great part of which, however, fell into the hands of the Engliſh; for, as ſoon as the river was froze over, brigadier Murray diſpatched thither 200 men, at whoſe approach the enemy abandoned their magazine, and retreated with great precipitation. Here the detachment took poſt in a church, until they could build two wooden redoubts, and mount them with artillery. In the mean time, the enemy returned with a greater force to recover the poſt, ſome battalions, with the light infantry, marched over the ice, in order to cut off their communication; but they fled with great confuſion, and afterwards took poſt at St. Michael, at a conſiderable diſtance farther down the aiver. They now reſolved to poſtpone the ſiege of Quebeck, that they might carry it on in a more regular manner. They began to rig their ſhips, repair their ſmall craft, build galleys, caſt bombs and bullets, and prepare facines and gabions; while brigadier Murray employed his men in making preparations for a vigorous defence. He ſent out a detachment, who ſurpriſed the enemy's poſts at St. Auguſtin, Maiſon Brulée, and Le Calvaire, where they took 90 priſoners. He afterwards ordered the light infantry to poſſeſs and fortify Cape Rouge, to prevent the enemy's landing at that place, as well as to be nearer at hand to obſerve their motions; but when the froſt broke up, ſo that their ſhips could fall down the river, they landed at St. Auguſtin, and the Engliſh poſts were abandoned one after another, the detachments retiring without loſs into the city.

Foulon below the camp; and for ſeveral days they were employed in landing their cannon, mortars, and ammunition. Mean while they worked inceſſantly at their trenches before the town; and on the 11th day of May opened one bomb battery, and three batteries of cannon. Brigadier Murray made the neceſſary diſpoſitions to defend the place to the laſt extremity: he raiſed two cavaliers, contrived ſome outworks, and planted the ramparts with 132 pieces of artillery, dragged thither moſtly by the ſoldiery. Though the enemy cannonaded the place with great vivacity the 1ſt day, their fire ſoon ſlackened, and their batteries were, in a manner, ſilenced by the ſuperior fire of the garriſon; nevertheleſs, Quebeck would in all probability, have reverted to its former owners, had a French fleet from Europe got the ſtart of an Engliſh ſquadron in ſailing up the river.

Lord Colville had ſailed from Halifax, with the fleet under his command, on the 22d day of April; but was retarded in his paſſage by thic fogs, contrary winds, and great ſhoals of ice floating down the river. Commodore Swanton, who had ſailed from England with a ſmall reenforcement, arrived about the beginning of May at the iſle of Bec, in the river St. Laurence, where, with two ſhips, he purpoſed to wait for the reſt of the ſquadron, which had ſeparated from him in the paſſage: but one of theſe, the Loweſtoffe, commanded by captain Deane, had entered the harbour of Quebeck, on the 9th day of May, and communicated to the governor the joyful news that the ſquadron was arrived in the river. Commodore Swanton no ſooner received intimation that Quebeck was beſieged, then he ſailed up the river with all poſſible expedition, and on the 15th in the evening anchored above Point Levi. The brigadier expreſſing an earneſt deſire that the French ſquadron above the town might be removed, the commodore ordered captain Schomberg of the Diana, and captain Deane of the Loweſtoffe, to ſlip their cabels early next morning, and attac the enemy's fleet, conſiſting of two frigates, two armed ſhips, and a great number of ſmaller veſſels. They were no ſooner in motion than the French ſhips fled in the utmoſt diſorder. One of their frigates was driven on the rocs above Cape Diamond; the other ran aſhore, and was burned at Point au Tremble, about ten leagues above the town; and all the other veſſels were taken or deſtroyed.

The enemy were ſo confounded and diſpirited by this diſaſter, and the certain information that a ſtrong Engliſh fleet was already in the river St. Laurence, that in the following night they raiſed the ſiege of Quebeck, and retreated with great precipitation, leaving their proviſions, implements, and artillery to governor Murray, who had intended to make a vigorous ſally in the morning, and attempt to penetrate into the camp of the beſiegers, which, from the information of priſoners and deſerters, he conceived to be a very practicable ſcheme. For this purpoſe he had ſelected a body of troops, who were already under arms, when a lieutenant, whom he had ſent out with a detachment to amuſe the enemy, came and aſſured him that their trenches were abandoned. He inſtantly marched out of Quebeck at the head of his forces, in hopes of overtaking and making an impreſſion on their rear, that he might have ample revenge for his late diſcomfiture; but they had paſſed the river Caprouge before he could come up with their army; however, he took ſome priſoners, and a great quantity of baggage, including their tents, ſtores, magazines of proviſion and ammunition, with 34 pieces of battering cannon, 10 field-pieces, 6 mortars, 4 petards, a great number of ſcaling ladders, entrenching tools, and every other implement for a ſiege. They retired to Jacques-Quartier, where their ammunition began to fail, and they were abandoned by great part of the Canadians; ſo that they reſigned all hope of ſucceeding againſt Quebeck, and began to take meaſures for the preſervation of Montreal, againſt which the force under general Amherſt was directed. There M. Vaudreuil had fixed his head-quarters, and there he propoſed to make his laſt ſtand againſt the efforts of the Britiſh general. He not only levied forces, collected magazines, and erected new fortifications in the iſland of Montreal, but he had even recourſe to feigned intelligence, and other arts of deluſion, to ſupport the ſpirits of the Canadians and their Indian allies, which had begun to flag, in conſequence of their being obliged to abandon the ſiege of Quebeck. It muſt be owned he acted with all the ſpirit and foreſight of an experienced general, determined to exert himſelf for the preſervation of the colony, even though very little proſpect of ſucceſs remained. His hopes, ſlender as they were, depended upon the natural ſtrength of the country, rendered almoſt inacceſſible by woods, mountains, and moraſſes, which might have retarded the progreſs of the Engliſh, and protracted the war, until a general pacification could be effected. In the mean time, major-general Amherſt was diligently employed in taking meaſures for the execution of the plan he had projected, in order to complete the conqueſt of Canada. He conveyed inſtructions to general Murray, directing him to advance by water towards Montreal, with all the troops that could be ſpared from the garriſon of Quebeck. He detached colonel Haviland, with a body of troops, from Crown-point, to take poſſeſſion of the Iſle aux Noix, in the lake Champlain, and from thence penetrate the ſhorteſt way to the bank of the river St. Laurence; while he himſelf, with the main body of the army, amounting to about 10,000 men, including Indians, ſhould proceed from the frontiers of New-York, by the rivers of the Mohawks and Oneidas, to the lake Ontario, and ſail down the river St. Laurance to the iſland of Montreal. Thus, on the ſuppoſition that all theſe particulars could be executed, the enemy muſt have been hemmed in, and entirely ſurrounded. In purſuance of this plan, general Amherſt had provided two armed ſloops to cruiſe in the lake Ontario, under the command of captain Loring; as well as a great number of batteaux, or ſmaller veſſels, for the tranſportation of the troops, artillery, ammunition, implements, and baggage. Several regiments were ordered to proceed from Albany to Oſwego; and the general taking his departure from Schenectady, with the reſt of the forces in the latter end of June, arrived at the ſame place on the 9th day of July.

Being informed that two French veſſels had appeared off Oſwego, he diſpatched ſome batteaux to Niagara, with intelligence to captain Loring, who immediately ſet ſail in queſt of them; but they eſcaped his purſuit, though they had twice appeared in the neighbourhood of Oſwego ſince the arrival of the general, who endeavoured to amuſe them, by detaching batteaux to different parts of the lake. The army being aſſembled, and joined by a conſiderable body of Indians, under the command of ſir William Johnſon, the general detached colonel Haldimand, with the light infantry, the grenadiers, and one battalion of highlanders, to take poſt at the bottom of the lake, and aſſiſt the armed veſſels in finding a paſſage to La Galette. On the 10th day of Auguſt the army embarked on board the batteaux and whale-boats, and proceeded on the lake towards the mouth of the river St. Laurence. Underſtanding that one of the enemy's veſſels had run a-ground and was diſabled, and that the other lay off La Galette, he reſolved to make the beſt of his way down the river to Swegatchie, and attac the French fort of Iſle Royale, one of the moſt important poſts on the river St. Laurence, the ſource of which it in a great meaſure commands. On the 17th the row-gallies fell in with the French ſloop commanded by M. de la Broquerie, who ſurrendered after a wam engagement. Mr Amherſt having detached ſome engineers to reconnoitre the coaſts and iſlands in the neighbourhood of Iſle Royale, he made a diſpoſition for the attac of that fortreſs, which was accordingly inveſted, after he had taken poſſeſſion of the iſlands. Some of theſe the enemy had abandoned with ſuch precipitation, as to leave behind a few ſcalps they had taken on the Mohawk river, a number of tools and utenſils, two ſwivels, ſome barrels of pitch, and a large quantity of iron. The Indians were ſo incenſed at ſight of the ſcalps, that they burned a chapel, and all the houſes of the enemy. Batteries being raiſed on the neareſt iſlands, the fort was cannonaded not only by them, but likewiſe by the armed ſloops; and a diſpoſition was made for giving the aſſault, when M. Pouchaut, the governor, thought proper to beat a parley, and ſurrender on capitulation. The general having taken poſſeſſion of the fort, found it ſo well ſituated for commanding the lake Ontario, and the Mohawk river, that he reſolved to maintain it with a garriſon, and employed ſome days in repairing the fortifications.

From this place his navigation down the river St. Laurence was rendered extremely difficult and dangerous, by a great number of violent riffs, or rapides, and falls; among which he loſt above 80 men, 46 batteaux, 17 whale-boats, one row-galley, with ſome artillery, ſtores, and ammunition. On the 6th day of September the troops were landed on the iſland of Montreal, without any oppoſition, except from ſome flying parties, which exchanged a few ſhot, and then fled with precipitation. That ſame day he repaired a bridge which they had broke down in their retreat, and after a march of two leagues, formed his army on a plain before

Montreal, where they lay all night on their arms. Montreal is in point of importance, the ſecond place in Canada, ſituated in an iſland of the river St. Laurence, at an equal diſtance from Quebeck and the lake Ontario. Its central ſituation rendered it the ſtaple of the Indian trade; yet the fortifications of it were inconſiderable, not at all adequate to the value of the place. General Amherſt ordered ſome pieces of artillery to be brought up immediately from the landing-place at La Chine, where he had left ſome regiments for the ſecurity of the boats, and determined to commence the ſiege in form; but in the morning of the 7th he received a letter from the marquis de Vaudreil by two officers, demanding a capitulation; which, after ſome letters had paſſed between the two generals, was granted upon as favourable terms as the French had reaſon to expect, conſidering that general Murray, with the troops from Quebeck, had by this time landed on the iſland; and colonel Haviland, with the body under his command, had juſt arrived on the ſouth-ſide of the river, oppoſite to Montreal: circumſtance equally favourable and ſurpriſing, if we reflect upon the different routs they purſued, through an enemy's country, where they had no intelligence of the motions of each other. Had any accident retarded the progreſs of general Amherſt, the reduction of Montreal would have been attempted by general Murray, who embarked with his troops at Quebeck on board of a great number of ſmall veſſels, under the command of captain Deane, in the Diana. This gentleman, with uncommon abilities, ſurmounted the difficulties of an unknown, dangerous, and intricate navigation; and conducted the voyage with ſuch ſucceſs, that not a ſingle veſſel was loſt in the expedition. M. de Levis, at the head of his forces, watched the motions of general Murray, who, in advancing up the river, publiſhed manifeſtoes among the Canadians, which produced all the effect he could deſire. Almoſt all the pariſhes on the ſouth ſhore, as far as the river Sorrel, ſubmitted, and took the oath of neutrality: and lord Rollo diſarmed all the inhabitants of the north ſhore, as far as Trois Rivieres, which, though the capital of a diſtrict, being no more than an open village, was taken without reſiſtance. In a word, general Amherſt took poſſeſſion of Montreal, and this completed the conqueſt of all Canada; a conqueſt the moſt important of any that ever the Britiſh arms achieved, whether we conſider the ſafety of the Engliſh colonies in North-America, now ſecured from invaſion and encroachment: the extent and fertility of the country ſubdued; or the whole Indian commerce thus transferred to the traders of Great-Britain. The terms of capitulation may perhaps be thought rather too favourable, as the enemy were actually encloſed, and deſtitute of all hope of relief: but little points like theſe ought always to be ſacrificed to the conſideration of great objects; and the finiſhing the conqueſt of a great country without bloodſhed redounds as much to the honour, as it argues the humanity of general Amherſt, whoſe conduct had been irreproachable during the whole courſe of the American operations. At the ſame time, it muſt be allowed he was extremely fortunate in having ſubordinate commanders who perfectly correſponded with his ideas, and a body of troops whom no labours could diſcourage, whom no dangers could diſmay. Sir William Johnſon, with a power of authority and inſinuation peculiar to himſelf, not only maintained a ſurpriſing aſcendancy over the moſt ferocious of all the Indian tribes, but kept them within the bounds of ſuch ſalutary reſtraint, that not one ſingle act of inhumanity was perpetrated by them during the whole courſe of this expedition. The zeal and conduct of brigadier-general Gage: the undaunted ſpirit and enterprizing genius of general Murray; the diligence and activity of colonel Haviland; happily co-operated in promoting this great event.

The French miniſtry had attempted to ſuccour Montreal, by equipping a conſiderable number of ſtore-ſhips, and ſending them out in the ſpring under convoy of a frigate; but as their officers underſtood that the Britiſh ſquadron had ſailed up the river St. Laurence before their arrival, they took ſhelter in the bay of Chaleurs, on the coaſt of Acadia, where they did not long remain unmoleſted. Captain Byron, who commanded the ſhips of war that were left at Louiſbourg, having received intelligence of them from brigadier-general Whitmore, ſailed thither with his ſquadron, and found them at anchor. The whole fleet conſiſted of one frigate, two large ſtore-ſhips, and nineteen ſail of ſmaller veſſels, the greater part of which had been taken from the merchants of Great-Britain: all theſe were deſtroyed, together with two batteries which had been raiſed for their protection. The French town, conſiſting of 200 houſes, was demoliſhed, and the ſettlement totally ruined. All the French ſubjects inhabiting the territories from the bay of Funday to the banks of the river St. Laurence, and all the Indians through that tract of country, were now ſubdued, and ſubjected to the Engliſh government. In the month of December of the preceding year, the French coloniſts of Miramichi, Rickebuctou, and other places lying along the gulf of St. Laurence, made their ſubmiſſion by deputies to colonel Frye, who commanded in Fort Cumberland at Chignecto. They afterwards renewed this ſubmiſſion in the moſt formal manner, by ſubſcribing articles, by which they obliged themſelves and the people they repreſented, to repair in the ſpring to Bay Verte, with all their effects and ſhipping, to be diſpoſed of according to the direction of colonel Laurence, governor of Halifax, in Nova-Scotia. They were accompanied by two Indian chiefs of the nation of the Mickmacks, a powerful and numerous people, now become entirely dependent upon his Britannic majeſty. In a word, by the conqueſt of Canada, the Indian fur-trade, in its full extent, fell into the hands of the Engliſh. The French intereſt among the ſavage tribes, inhabiting an immenſe tract of country, was totally extinguiſhed; and their American poſſeſſions ſhrunk within the limits of Louiſiana, an infant colony on the ſouth of the Miſſiſſippi, which the Britiſh arms may at any time eaſily ſubdue.

The conqueſt of Canada being achieved, nothing now remained to be done in North-America, except the demoliſhing of the fortifications of Louiſbourg on the iſland of Cape-Breton; for which purpoſe, ſome able engineers had been ſent from England with the ſhips commanded by captain Byron. By means of mines artfully diſpoſed and well conſtructed, the fortifications were reduced to a heap of rubbiſh, the glacis was levelled, and the ditches were filled. All the artillery, ammunition, and implements of war, were conveyed to Halifax; but the barracs were repaired, ſo as to accommodate 300 men occaſionally; and the hoſpital, with the private houſes, were left ſtanding. The French ſtill poſſeſſed, upon the continent of America, the fertile country lying on each ſide of the great river Miſſiſſipi, which diſembogues itſelf into the gulf of Florida; but the colony was ſo thinly peopled, and ſo ill provided, that far from being formidable, it ſcarce could have ſubſiſted, unleſs the Britiſh traders had been baſe and treacherous enough to ſupply it from time to time with proviſions and neceſſaries. The ſame infamous commerce was carried on with divers French plantations in the Weſt-Indies; inſomuch that the governors of provinces, and commanders of the ſquadrons ſtationed in thoſe ſeas, made formal complaints of it to the miniſtry. The temptation of extraordinary profit excited the merchants, not only to aſſiſt the enemies of their country, but alſo to run all riſks in eluding the vigilance of the legiſlature. The inhabitants of Martinique found a plentiful market of proviſion furniſhed by the Britiſh ſubjects at the Dutch iſlands of Euſtatia and Curacoa; and thoſe that were ſettled on the iſland of Hiſpaniola were ſupplied in the ſame manner at the Spaniſh ſettlements of Monte-Chriſto.

While the Britiſh commanders exerted themſelves by ſea and land with the moſt laudable ſpirit of vigilance and courage againſt the foreign adverſaries of their country, the coloniſts of Jamaica ran the moſt imminent hazard of being extirpated by a domeſtic enemy. The negro-ſlaves of that iſland, grown inſolent in the contemplation of their own formidable numbers, or by obſerving the ſupine indolence of their maſters, or ſtimulated by that appetite for liberty ſo natural to the mind of man, began, in the courſe of this year, to entertain thoughts of ſhaking off the yoke by means of a general inſurrection. Aſſemblies were held, and plans revolved for this purpoſe. At length they concerted a ſcheme for riſing in arms all at once in different parts of the iſland, in order to maſſacre all the white men, and take poſſeſſion of the government. They agreed that this deſign ſhould be put in execution immediately after the departure of the fleet for Europe; but their plan was defeated by their ignorance and impatience. Thoſe of the conſpirators that belonged to captain Foreſt's eſtate, being impelled by the fumes of intoxication, fell ſuddenly upon the overſeer, while he ſat at ſupper with ſome friends, and butchered the whole company. Being immediately joined by ſome of their confederates, they attacked the neighbouring plantations, where they repeated the ſame barbarities, and ſeizing all the arms and ammunition that fell in their way, began to grow formidable to the colony. The governor no ſooner received intimation of this diſturbance, than he, by proclamation, ſubjected the coloniſts to martial law. All other buſineſs was interrupted, and every man took to his arms. The regular troops, joined by the troop of militia, and a conſiderable number of volunteers, marched from Spaniſh-Town to St. Mary's, where the inſurrection began, and ſkirmiſhed with the inſurgents: but as they declined ſtanding any regular engagement, and truſted chiefly to buſh-fighting, the governor employed againſt them the free blacs, commonly known by the name of the Wild Negroes, now peaceably ſettled under the protection of the government. Theſe auxiliaries, in conſideration of a price ſet upon the heads of the rebels, attacked them in their own way, ſlew them by ſurpriſe, until their ſtrength was broken, and numbers made away with themſelves in deſpair, ſo that the inſurrection was ſuppoſed to be quelled about the beginning of May; but in June it broke out again with redoubled fury, and the rebels were re-enforced to a very conſiderable number. The regular troops and the militia, joined by a body of ſailors, formed a camp, under the command of colonel Spragge, who ſent out detachments againſt the negroes, a great number of whom were killed, and ſome taken; but the reſt, inſtead of ſubmitting, took ſhelter in the woods and mountains. The priſoners being tried, and found guilty of rebellion, were put to death by a variety of tortures. Some were hanged, ſome beheaded, ſome burned, and ſome fixed alive upon gibbets. One of theſe laſt lived eight days and eighteen hours, ſuſpended under a vertical ſun, without being refreſhed by one drop of water, or receiving any manner of ſuſtenance. In order to prevent ſuch inſurrections for the future, the juſtices aſſembled at the ſeſſions of the peace eſtabliſhed regulations, importing, that no negro-ſlave ſhould be allowed to quit his plantation without a white conductor, or a ticket of leave; that every negro playing at any ſort of game ſhould be ſcourged through the public ſtreets; that every publican ſuffering ſuch gaming in his houſe ſhould forfeit forty ſhillings; that every proprietor ſuffering his negroes to beat a drum, blow a horn, or make any noiſe in his plantation, ſhould be fined 10l. and every overſeer allowing theſe irregularities ſhould pay half that ſum, to be demanded, or diſtrained for, by any civil or military officer; that every free negro, or mulatto, ſhould wear a blue croſs on his right ſhoulder, on pain of impriſonment; that no mulatto, Indian, or negro, ſhould hawk or ſell any thing, except freſh fiſh and milk, on pain of being ſcourged; that rum and punch houſes ſhould be ſhut up during divine ſervice on Sundays, under the penalty of 20s. and that thoſe who had petit licences ſhould ſhut up their houſes on other nights at 9 o'clock.

Notwithſtanding theſe examples and regulations, a body of rebellious negroes ſtill ſubſiſted in places that were deemed inacceſſible to regular forces, and from theſe they made nocturnal irruptions into the neareſt plantations, where they acted with all the wantonneſs of barbarity; ſo that the people of Jamaica were obliged to conduct themſelves with the utmoſt vigilance and circumſpection; while rear-admiral Holmes, who commanded at ſea, took every precaution to ſecure the iſland from inſult or invaſion. He not only took meaſures for the defence of Jamaica, but alſo contrived and executed ſchemes for annoying the enemy. Having, in the month of October, received intelligence that five French frigates were equipped at Cape-François, on the iſland of Hiſpaniola, in order to convoy a fleet of merchant ſhips to Europe, he ſtationed the ſhips under his command in ſuch a manner as was moſt likely to intercept this fleet; and his diſpoſition was attended with ſucceſs. The enemy ſailed from the Cape to the number of eight ſail on the 16th, and next day they were chaſed by the king's ſhips the Hampſhire, Lively, and Boreas, which, however, made ſmall progreſs, as there was little wind, and that variable. In the evening, the breeſe freſhened, and about midnight the Boreas came up with the Sirenne, commanded by commodore M'Cartie. They engaged with great vivacity for about 25 minutes, when the Sirenne ſhot a-head, and made the beſt of her way. The Boreas was ſo damaged in her rigging, that ſhe could not cloſe with the enemy again till next day, at two in the afternoon, when the action was renewed off the eaſt end of Cuba, and maintained till forty minutes paſt four, when mr. M'Cartie ſtruc. In the mean time, the Hampſhire and Lively gave chace to the other four French frigates, which ſteered to the ſouthward with all the ſail they could carry, in order to reach the weſt end of Tortuga, and ſhelter themſelves in Port au Prince. On the 18th the Lively, by the help of her oars, came up with the Valeur, at half an hour paſt ſeven in the morning; and after a hot action, which continued an hour and a half, compelled the enemy to ſubmit,. The Hampſhire ſtood after the other three, and about four in the afternoon, ran up between the Duke de Choiſeul and the Prince Edward. Theſe ſhe engaged at the ſame time; but the firſt, having the advantage of the wind, made her retreat into Port au Paix; the other ran a-ſhore about two leagues to leeward, and ſtruc her colours, but at the approach of the Hampſhire the enemy ſet her on fire, and ſhe blew up. This was alſo the fate of the Fleur de Lys, which had run into Freſh-Water-Bay, a little farther to leeward of Port au Prince. Thus, by the prudent diſpoſition of admiral Holmes, and the gallantry of his three captains Norbury, Uvedale, and Maitland, two large frigates of the enemy were taken, and three deſtroyed. The ſpirit of the officers was happily ſupported by an uncommon exertion of courage in the men, who chearfully engaged in the moſt dangerous enterprizes. Immediately after the capture of the French frigates, eight of the enemy's privateers were deſtroyed or brought into Jamaica. Two of theſe, namely the Vainqueur of ten guns, ſixteen ſwivels, and ninety men, and the Mackau of ſix ſwivels and fifteen men, had run into ſhoal water in Cumberland harbour, on the iſland of Cuba. The boats of the Trent and Boreas, manned, under the direction of the lieutenants Millar and Stuart, being rowed up to the Vainqueur, boarded and took poſſeſſion under a cloſe fire, after having ſurmounted many other difficulties. The Mackau was taken without any reſiſtance; then the boats proceeded againſt the Gueſpe, of eight guns, and 85 men, which lay at anchor further up in the Lagoon; but before they came up the enemy had ſet her on fire, and ſhe was deſtroyed.

The ſame activity and reſolution diſtinguiſhed the captains and officers belonging to the ſquadron commanded by ſir James Douglas off the Leeward-Iſlands. In the month of September, the captains Obrien and Taylor, of the ſhips Temple and Griffin, being on a joint cruiſe off the iſlands Granadas, received intelligence that the Virgin, formerly a Britiſh ſloop of war, which had been taken by the enemy, then lay at anchor, together with three privateers, under protection of three forts on the iſland, ſailed thither in order to attac them, and their enterprize was crowned with ſucceſs. After a warm engagement, which laſted ſeveral hours, the enemy's batteries were ſilenced, and indeed demoliſhed, and the Engliſh captains took poſſeſſion of the four prizes. They afterwards entered another harbour of that iſland, having firſt demoliſhed another fort; and there they lay four days unmoleſted, at the expiration of which they carried off three other prizes. In their return to Antigua, they fell in with thirteen ſhips bound to Martinique with proviſions, and took them all without reſiſtance. About the ſame time, eight or nine privateers were taken by the ſhips which commodore ſir James Douglas employed in cruiſing round the iſland of Guadaloupe, ſo that the Britiſh commerce in thoſe ſeas flouriſhed under his care and protection.

In the Eaſt-Indies the Britiſh arms ſtill continued to proſper. After the reduction of Arcot, the garriſon of Permacoil and Allumparva ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war in the beginning of May. The Falmouth obliged the Haarlem, a French ſhip from Merguy, to run aſhore to the northward of Pondicherry. The important ſettlement of Carical was reduced by the ſea and land-forces commanded by rear-admiral Corniſh and major Monſon, and the French garriſon made priſoners of war; and colonel Coote formed the blockade of Pondicherry by land, while the harbour was beſet by the Engliſh ſquadron.

No action of importance was in the courſe of this year achieved by the naval force of Great-Britain in the ſeas of Europe. A powerful ſquadron ſtill remained in the bay of Quiberon, in order to amuſe and employ a body of French forces on that part of the coaſt, and interrupt the navigation of the enemy; though the principal aim of this armament ſeems to have been to watch and detain the few French ſhips which had run into the river Villaine, after the defeat of Conflans, an object, the importance of which will doubtleſs aſtoniſh poſterity. The fleet employed on this ſervice was alternately commanded by admiral Boſcawen and ſir Edward Hawke, officers of diſtinguiſhed abilities, whoſe talents might have been ſurely rendered ſubſervient to much greater national advantages. All that mr. Boſcawen could do in this circumſcribed ſcene of action was to take poſſeſſion of a ſmall iſland near the river Vannes, which he cauſed to be cultivated, and planted with vegetables, for the uſe of the men infected with ſcorbutic diſorders ariſing from ſalt proviſion, ſea air, and want of proper exerciſe. In the month of September, ſir Edward Hawke, who had by this time relieved mr. Boſcawen, detached the gallant lord Howe, in the Magnanime, with the ſhips Prince Frederick and Bedford, to reduce the little iſland of Dumet, about three miles in length, and two in breadth, abounding with freſh water. It was defended by a ſmall fort, mounted with nine cannon, and manned with one company of the regiment of Bourbon, who ſurrendered in a very ſhort time after the ſhips had begun the attac. By this ſmall conqueſt a conſiderable expence was ſaved to the nation in the article of tranſports employed to carry water for the uſe of the ſquadron.

Admiral Rodney ſtill maintained his former ſtation off the coaſt of Havre de Grace, to obſerve what ſhould paſs at the mouth of the Seine. In the month of July, while he hovered in this neighbourhood, five large flat-bottomed boats, laden with cannon and ſhot, ſet ſail from Harfleur in the middle of the day, with their colours flying, as if they had ſet the Engliſh ſquadron at defiance, for the walls of Havre de Grace, and even the adjacent hills, were covered with ſpectators, aſſembled to behold the iſſue of this adventure. Having reached the river of Caen, they ſtood backwards and forwards upon the ſhoals, intending to amuſe admiral Rodney till night, and then proceed under cover of the darkneſs. He perceived their drift, and gave directions to his ſmall veſſels to be ready, that as ſoon as daylight failed they ſhould make all the ſail they could for the mouth of the river Orne, in order to cut off the enemy's retreat, while he himſelf ſtood with the larger ſhips to the ſteep coaſt of Port-Baſſin. The ſcheme ſucceeded to his wiſh. The enemy, ſeeing their retreat cut off, ran aſhore at Port-Baſſin, where the admiral deſtroyed them, together with the ſmall fort which had been erected for the defence of this harbour. Each of thoſe veſſels was 100 feet in length, and capable of containing 400 men for a ſhort paſſage. What their deſtination was we cannot pretend to determine; but the French had provided a great number of theſe tranſports; for ten eſcaped into the river Orne leading to Caen; and in conſequence of this diſaſter 100 were unloaded, and ſent up again to Rouen. This was not all the damage that the enemy ſuſtained on this part of the coaſt. In the month of November, captain Ourry, of the Acteon, chaſed a large privateer, and drove her aſhore between Cape-Barfleur and La Hogue, where ſhe periſhed. The cutters belonging to admiral Rodney's ſquadron ſcoured the coaſt towards Dieppe, where a conſiderable fiſhery was carried on, and where they took or deſtroyed near forty veſſels of conſiderable burthen. Though the Engliſh navy ſuffered nothing from the French during this period, it ſuſtained ſome damage from the weather. The Conqueror, a new ſhip of the line, was loſt in the channel, on the iſland of St. Nicholas, but the crew and cannon were ſaved. The Lyme, of 20 guns, foundered in the Cattegat, in Norway, and 50 of the men periſhed; and, in the Weſt-Indies, a tender belonging to the Dublin, commanded by commodore ſir James Douglas, was loſt in a gale of wind, with 100 choſen mariners.

Of the domeſtic tranſactions relating to the war, the moſt conſiderable was the equipment of a powerful armament deſtined for ſome ſecret expedition. A numerous body of forces was aſſembled, and a great number of tranſports collected at Portſmouth. Generals were nominated to the command of this enterprize. The troops were actually embarked with a great train of artillery; and the eyes of the whole nation were attentively fixed upon this armament, which could not have been prepared without incurring a prodigious expence. Notwithſtanding theſe preparations, the whole ſummer was ſpent in idleneſs and inaction; and in the latter end of the ſeaſon the undertaking was laid aſide. The people did not fail to clamour againſt the inactivity of the ſummer, and complain, that, notwithſtanding the immenſe ſubſidies granted for the proſecution of the war, no ſtroke of importance was ſtruc in Europe for the advantage of Great-Britain; but that her treaſure was laviſhed upon fruitleſs parade, or a German alliance, ſtill more pernicious. It muſt be owned, indeed, that no new attempt was made to annoy the enemy on Britiſh principles, for the ſurrender of Montreal was the natural conſequence of the ſteps which had been taken, and of the meaſures concerted in the courſe of the preceding year. It will be allowed, we apprehend, that the expence incurred by the armament at Portſmouth, and the body of troops there detained, would have been ſufficient, if properly applied, to reduce the iſland of Mauritius in the Indian ocean, Martinique in the Weſt-Indies, or Minorca in the Mediterranean, and all theſe three were objects of importance. In all probability, the deſign of the armament was either to intimidate the French into propoſals of peace, to make a diverſion from the Rhine, by alarming the coaſt of Bretagne, or to throw over a body of troops into Flanders, to effect a junction with the hereditary prince of Brunſwick, who, at the head of 20,000 men, had made an irruption as far as the Lower Rhine, and even croſſed that river; but he miſcarried in the execution of his deſign.

In the midſt of theſe alarms ſome regard was paid to the improvements of natural knowledge. The Royal Society having made application to the king, repreſenting that there would be a tranſit of Venus over the diſk of the ſun, on the 6th day of June, and that there was reaſon to hope the parallax of that planet might be more accurately determined, by making proper obſervations of this phænomenon at the the iſland of St. Helena, near the coaſt of Africa, and at Bencoolen, in the Eaſt-Indies, his majeſty granted a ſum of money to defray the expence of ſending able aſtronomers to thoſe two places, and ordered a ſhip of war to be equipped for their conveyance. Accordingly, mr. Nevil Maſkeylyne and mr. Robert Waddington were appointed to make obſervations at St. Helena; and mr. Charles Maſon and mr. Jeremiah Dixon undertook the voyage to Bencoolen, on the iſland of Sumatra[1].

Except the countries that were actually the ſcenes of war, no political revolution or diſturbance diſquieted the general tranquillity. Syria, indeed, felt all the horrors and wrec of a dreadful earthquake, protracted in repeated ſhocs, which began on the 30th day of October. in the neighbourhood of Tripoli. A great number of houſes were overthrown at Seyde, and many people buried under the ruins. It was felt through a ſpace of 10,000 ſquare leagues, comprehending the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, with an infinite number of villages, that were reduced to heaps of rubbiſh. At Acra, or Ptolemais, the ſea overflowed its banks, and poured into the ſtreets, though eight feet above the level of the water. The city of Saphet was entirely deſtroyed, and the greateſt part of its inhabitants periſhed. At Damaſcus all the minorets were overthrown, and 6000 people loſt their lives. The ſhocs diminiſhed gradually till the 25th of November, when they were renewed with redoubled havoc; the earth trembled with the moſt dreadful convulſions, and the greater part of Trivoli was deſtroyed. Balbeck was entirely ruined, and this was the fate of many other towns and caſtles; ſo that the people who eſcaped the ruins were obliged to ſojourn in the open fields, and all Syria was threatened with the vengeance of heaven. Such a dangerous ferment aroſe at Conſtantinople, that a revolution was apprehended. Muſtapha, the preſent emperor, had no ſons; but his brother Bajazet, whoſe life he had ſpared, contrary to the maxims of Turkiſh policy, produced a ſon by one of the women with whom he was indulged in his confinement; a circumſtance which arouſed the jealouſy of the emperor to ſuch a degree, that he reſolved to diſpatch his brother. The great officers of the Porte oppoſed this deſign, which was ſo diſagreeable to the people, that an inſurrection enſued. Several Turks and Armenians, taking it for granted that a revolution was at hand, bought up great quantities of grain; and a dreadful dearth was the conſequence of this monopoly. The ſultan aſſembled the troops, quieted the inſurgents, ordered the engroſſers of corn to be executed, and in a little time the repoſe of the city was re-eſtabliſhed.

Notwithſtanding the proſpect of a rupture in Italy, no new incident interrupted the tranquillity which the ſoutharn parts of Europe enjoyed. The king of Spain, howſoever ſollicited by the other branch of the houſe of Bourbon to engage in the war, as its ally, refuſed to interpoſe in any other way, than as a mediator between the courts of London and Verſailles. He ſent the conde de Fuentes, a nobleman of high rank and character, in quality of embaſſador extraordinary to the king of Great-Britain, in order to offer his good offices for effecting a peace: and the conde, after having conferred with the Engliſh miniſtry, made an excurſion to Paris; but his propoſal with reſpect to a ceſſation of hoſtilities, if in reality ſuch a propoſal was ever made, did not meet with a cordial reception. Other differences ſubſiſting between the crowns of Great-Britain and Spain he found no difficuly in compromiſing. His catholic majeſty perſiſted in the execution of a plan truly worthy of a patriot king. In the firſt place he ſpared no pains and application to make himſelf thoroughly acquainted with the ſtate of his kingdom. He remitted to his people all they owed the crown, amounting to threeſcore millions of reals; he demanded an exact account of his father's debts, that they might be diſcharged with the utmoſt punctuality: an order was ſent to the treaſury, that ten millions of reals ſhould be annually appropriated for this purpoſe, until the whole ſhould be liquidated; and, to the firſt year's payment, he added fifty millions, to be divided equally among the legal claimants. He took meaſures for the vigorous execution of the laws againſt offenders: encouraged induſtry; protected commerce; and felt the exquiſite pleaſure of being beloved as the father of his people. To give importance to his crown, and extend his influence among the powers of Europe, he equipped a powerful ſquadron of ſhips at Carthagena, and is ſaid to have declared his intention to employ them againſt Algiers, ſhould the dey refuſe to releaſe the ſlaves of the Spaniſh nation.

[1] In the beginning of April, the king granted to his grandſon, prince Edward Auguſtus, and to the heirs male of his royal highneſs, the dignities of duke of the kingdom of Great-Britain, and of earl of the kingdom of Ireland, by the names, ſtiles, and titles of duke of York and Albany, and earl of Ulſter.

Portugal ſtill ſeemed agitated from the ſhoc of the late conſpiracy which was quelled in that kingdom. The pope's nuncio was not only forbid the court, but even ſent under a ſtrong guard to the frontiers: an indignity which induced the pontiff to order the Portugueſe miniſter at Rome to evacuate the eccleſiaſtical dominions. In the mean time, another embarkation of jeſuits was ſent from Liſbon to Civita Vecchia; yet the expulſion of theſe fathers did not reſtore the internal peace of Portugal, or put an end to the practice of plotting: for, even ſince their departure, ſome perſons of rank have been either committed to cloſe priſon, or exiled from the kingdom. The jeſuits were not more fortunate in America; for in the month of October, in the foregoing year, an obſtinate battle was fought between the united forces of Spain and Portugal, and the Indians of Paraguay, who were under the dominion of the jeſuits: victory at length declared in favour of the two crowns: ſo that the vanquiſhed were obliged to capitulate, and lay down their arms. As the court of Portugal had made remonſtrances to the Britiſh miniſtry againſt the proceedings of the Engliſh ſquadron under admiral Boſcawen, which had attacked and deſtroyed ſome French ſhips under the Portugueſe fort in the bay of Lagos, his Britannic majeſty thought proper to ſend the earl of Kinnoul, as embaſſador extraordinary to Liſbon, where that nobleman made ſuch excuſes for the inſult of the Engliſh admiral, as entirely removed all miſunderſtanding between the two crowns; and could not fail of being agreeable to the Portugueſe monarch, thus reſpected, ſoothed, and deprecated by a mighty nation, in the very zenith of power and proſperity. On the 6th of June, being the birth-day of the king of Portugal, the marriage of his brother, don Pedro, with the princeſs of Brazil, was celebrated in the chapel of the palace where the king reſides, to the univerſal joy of the people. The nuptials were announced to the public by diſcharge of the cannon, and celebrated with illuminations, and all kinds of rejoicing.

An accident which happened in the Mediterranean had like to have drawn the indignation of the Ottoman Porte on the knights of the order of Malta. A large Turkiſh ſhip of the line, mounted with 68 braſs cannon, having on board a complement of 700 men, beſides 70 chriſtian ſlaves, under the immediate command of the Turkiſh admiral, had, in company with two frigates, five gallies, and other ſmaller veſſels, ſailed in June from the Dardanelles, cruiſed along the coaſts of Smyrna, Scio, and Trio, and at length anchored in the channel of Stangie, where the admiral with 400 perſons went on ſhore, on the 19th day of September: the chiſtian ſlaves, ſeizing this opportunity, armed themſelves with knives, and fell upon the 300 that remained with ſuch fury and effect, that a great number of the Turks were inſtantly ſlain; many leaped overboard into the ſea, where they periſhed; and the the reſt ſued for mercy. The chriſtians, having thus ſecured poſſeſſion of the ſhip, hoiſted ſail, and bore away for Malta: which, though chaſed by the two frigates, and a Raguſan ſhip, they reached, by crowding all their canvas, and brought their prize ſafe into the harbour of Valette, amidſt the acclamations of the people. The order of Malta, as a recompence for this ſignal act of bravery and reſolution, aſſigned to the captors the whole property of the ſhip and ſlaves, together with all the effects on board, including a ſum of money, which the Turkiſh commander had collected by contribution, amounting to a million and a half of florins. The grand-ſignor was ſo enraged at this event, that he diſgraced his admiral, and threatened to take vengeance on the order of Malta, for having detained the ſhip, and countenanced the capture.

With reſpect to the diſputes which had ſo long embroiled the northern parts of Europe, the neutral powers ſeemed as averſe as ever to a participation. The king of Denmark continued to perfect thoſe plans which he had wiſely formed for increaſing the wealth, and promoting the happineſs of his ſubjects; nor did he neglect any opportunity of improving natural knowledge, for the benefit of mankind in general. He employed men of ability, at his own expence, to travel into foreign countries, and to collect the moſt curious productions, for the advancement of natural hiſtory: he encouraged the liberal and machanic arts at home, by munificent rewards, and peculiar protection: he invited above 1000 foreigners from Germany to become his ſubjects, and ſettle in certain diſtricts of Jutland, which had lain waſte above three centuries; and they forthwith began to build villages, and cultivate the lands in the dioceſes of Wibourg, Arhous, and Ripen. Their travelling expences from Altena to the new ſettlement were defrayed by the king, who, moreover maintained them until the produce of the lands could afford a comfortable ſubſiſtence. He likewiſe beſtowed upon each coloniſt a houſe, a barn, and a ſtable, with a certain number of horſes and cattle. Finally, this generous patriot having viſited theſe new ſubjects, who received him with unſpeakable emotions of joy and affection, he ordered a conſiderable ſum of money to be diſtributed among them, as an additional mark of his favour. Such conduct in a prince cannot fail to ſecure the warmeſt returns of loyalty and attachment in his people: and the execution of ſuch laudable ſchemes will endear his name to the contemplation of poſterity.

The Dutch, as uſual, perſevered in proſecuting every branch of commerce, without being diverted with leſs profitable ſchemes of ſtate policy by the inſinuations of France or the remonſtrances of Great-Britain. The violation of the peace by their ſubjects in Bengal was no ſooner known at the court of London, than orders were ſent to general Yorke, the Engliſh embaſſador at the Hague, to demand an explanation. He, accordingly, preſented a memorial to the ſtates-general, ſignifying that their high-mightineſſes muſt, doubtleſs, be greatly aſtoniſhed to hear, by public papers, of the irregularities committed by their ſubjects in the Eaſt-Indies; but that they would be much more amazed on peruſing the piece annexed to this memorial, containing a minute account, ſpecified with the ſtricteſt regard to truth, of the irregular conduct obſerved by the Dutch towards the Britiſh ſubjects in the river of Bengal, at a time when the factors and traders of Holland enjoyed all the ſweets of peace, and all the advantages of unmoleſted commerce; at a time when his Britannic majeſty, from his great regard to their high-mightineſſes, carefully avoided giving the leaſt umbrage to the ſubjects of the United Provinces. He obſerved, that the king his ſovereign was deeply affected by theſe outrageous doings and miſchievous deſigns of the Dutch in the Eaſt-Indies, whoſe aim was to deſtroy the Britiſh ſettlements in that country; an aim that would have been accompliſhed, had not the king's victorious arms brought them to reaſon, and obliged them to ſue for an accommodation. He told them his majeſty would willingly believe their high-mightineſſes had given no order for proceeding to ſuch extremities, and that the directors of their India company had no ſhare in the tranſaction: nevertheleſs, he (the embaſſador) was ordered to demand ſignal ſatisfaction, in the name of the king his maſter; that all who ſhould be found to have ſhared in the offence ſo manifeſtly tending to the deſtruction of the Engliſh ſettlements in that country ſhould be exemplary puniſhed; and that their high-mightineſſes ſhould confirm the ſtipulations agreed upon immediately after the action by the directors of the reſpective companies, in conſideration of which agreement the Dutch ſhips were reſtored, after their commanders acknowledged their fault, in owning themſelves the aggreſſors. To this remonſtrance the ſtates-general replied, that nothing of what was laid to the charge of their ſubjects had yet reached their knowledge; but they requeſted his Britannic majeſty to ſuſpend his judgement, until he ſhould be made perfectly acquainted with the grounds of thoſe diſputes; and they promiſed he ſhould have reaſon to be ſatisfied with the exemplary puniſhment that would be inflicted upon all who ſhould be found concerned in violating the peace between the two nations [m].

[m] In the month of March the ſtates of Holland and Weſt Frieſland having, after warm debates, agreed to the propoſed match between the princeſs Caroline, ſiſter to the prince of Orange, and the prince of Naſſau Weilbourg, the nuptials were ſolemnized at the Hague with great magnificence.

The war in Germany ſtill raged with unrelenting fury, and the mutual rancour of the contending parties ſeemed to derive freſh force from their mutual diſappointments; at leaſt, the houſe of Auſtria ſeemed ſtill implacable, and obſtinately bent upon terminating the war with the deſtruction of the Pruſſian monarch. Her allies, however, ſeemed leſs actuated by the ſpirit of revenge. The French king had ſuſtained ſo much damage and diſgrace in the courſe of the war, that his reſources failed, and his finances fell into diſorder; he could no longer afford the ſubſides he had promiſed to different powers; while his ſubjects clamoured aloud at the burthen of impoſitions, the ruin of trade and the repeated diſhonour entailed upon the arms of France. The czarina's zeal for the alliance was evidently cooled by the irregular and defective payments of the ſubſides ſhe had ſtipulated. Perhaps ſhe was diſappointed in her hope of conqueſt, and chagrined to ſee her armies retire from Germany at the approach of every winter; and the Britiſh miniſtry did not fail to exert all their influence to detach her from the confederacy in which ſhe had embarked. Sweden ſtill languiſhed in an ineffectual parade of hoſtilities againſt the houſe of Brandenbourgh; but the French intereſt began to loſe ground in the diet of that kingdom. The king of Pruſſia, howſoever exhauſted in the article of men, betrayed no ſymptom of apprehenſion, and made no advance towards a pacification with his adverſaries. He had employed the winter in recruiting his armies by every expedient his fertile genius could deviſe; in levying contributions to re-enforce the vaſt ſubſidy he received from England, in filling magazines, and making every preparation for a vigorous campaign. in Weſtphalia, the ſame foreſight and activity were exerted by prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, who in the beginning of ſummer found himſelf at the head of a very numerous army, paid by Great-Britain, and ſtrengthened by 22,000 national troops.

No alteration in the terms of this alliance was produced by the death of William Landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, who breathed his laſt, in an advanced age, on the 28th day of January, at Rintelen upon the Weſer. He was ſucceeded in the landgraviate by his ſon Frederick, whoſe conſort, the princeſs Mary, daughter to the king of Great-Britain, now, in quality of governeſs of her children, aſſumed the regency and adminiſtration of the county of Hanau-Mutzenberg, by virtue of the ſettlement made in the life-time of her father-in-law, and confirmed by her huſband. She had for ſome years been ſeparated from him, and reſided with his father, at whoſe deceaſe ſhe retired, with her children, to the city of Zell. The preſent landgrave, who lived at Magdebourg, as vice-governor under the king of Pruſſia, no ſooner learned the news of his father's death, than he ſent an intimation of it to that prince and the king of Great-Britain, declaring at the ſame time, that he would ſcrupulouſly adhere to the engagements of his predeceſſor.

The advances towards a peace, which had been made in the preceding year by the kings of England and Pruſſia, in their declaration publiſhed at the Hague by prince Louis of Brunſwick, ſeemed to infuſe in neutral powers a good opinion of their moderation. We have already ſeen that the king of Spain offered his beſt offices in quality of mediator. When a congreſs was propoſed, the ſtates-general made an offer of Breda, as a place proper for the negotiation. The king of Great-Britain, by the mouth of his embaſſador, thanked their high-mightineſſes for the ſincere deſire they expreſſed to put an end to the ravages of war, which had extended deſolation over the face of Europe: he readily cloſed with their gracious offer, and in conſequence of his high regard and invariable friendſhip for their high-mightineſſes, wiſhed earneſtly that it might be acceptable to the other powers at war. The French king expreſſed his ſentiments nearly to the ſame purpoſe. His embaſſador declared, That his moſt chriſtian majeſty was highly ſenſible of the offer they had made of Breda for holding the congreſs; that, in order to give a freſh proof of his ſincere deſire to increaſe the good harmony that ſubſiſted between him and the ſtates-general, he accepted their offer with pleaſure; but as he could take no ſtep without the concurrence of his high allies, he was obliged to wait for their anſwer, which could not fail to be favourable, if nothing remained to be ſettled but the place for holding the congreſs. King Staniſlaus having written a letter to his Britannic majeſty, offered the city of Nancy for the ſame purpoſe, he received a civil anſwer, expreſſing the king of England's ſenſe of his obliging offer, which, however, he declined, as a place not conveniently ſituated for all the powers intereſted in the great work of pacification. Civilities of the ſame nature likewiſe paſſed between the ſovereign of Nancy and the king of Pruſſia. As the propoſals for an accommodation made by the king of England and his allies might have left an unfavourable impreſſion of their adverſaries had they been altogether declined, the court of Vienna was prevailed upon to concur with her allies in a declaration profeſſing their deſire of peace, which declaration was delivered on the 3d day of April, by the Auſtrian miniſter reſiding at the Hague, to his ſerene highneſs prince Louis of Brunſwick; and a paper of the ſame nature was alſo delivered to him ſeperately by the French and Ruſſian miniſters[n]. Theſe profeſſions, however, did not interrupt the operations of the campaign.

Though the French army under the mareſchal duke de Broglio remained in cantonement in the neighbourhood of Friedberg, and prince Ferdinand had retired from Corſdorff to Marpurg, where, in the beginning of January he eſtabliſhed his head-quarters, nevertheleſs, the winter was by no means inactive. As far bac as the 25th of December the duke de Broglio, having called in his detachments, attempted to ſurpriſe the allied army by a forced march to Klein-linnes; but finding them prepared to give him a warm reception, nothing but a cannonade enſued, and he retreated to his former quarters. On the 29th colonel Luckner, at the head of the Hanoverian hunters, fell in with a detachment of the enemy, conſiſting of 400 men, under the command of count Muret. Theſe he attacked with ſuch vigour, that the count was made priſoner, and all his party either killed or taken, except 22, who eſcaped. On the 3d day of January the marquis de Vogue attacked the town of Herborn, which he carried, and took a ſmall detachment of the allies, who were poſted there. At the ſame time the marquis Dauvet made himſelf maſter of Dillembourg, the garriſon of the allied troops being obliged to retire into the caſtle, where they were cloſely beſieged. Prince Ferdinand no ſooner underſtood their ſituation than he began his march with a ſtrong detachment for their relief, on the ſeventh day of the ſame month, when he attacked and totally defeated the beſiegers, took 700 priſoners, including 40 officers, with ſeven pair of colours, and two pieces of cannon. On that very day, the highlanders, under major Keith, ſupported by the huſſars of Luckner, who commander the whole detachment, attacked the village of Eybach, where Beaufremont's regiment of dragoons was poſted on the ſide of Dillembourg, and routed them with great ſlaughter. The greater part of the regiment was killed, and many priſoners were taken, together with 200 horſes, and all their baggage. The highlanders diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion by their intrepidity, which was the more remarkable, as they were no other than raw recruits, juſt arrived from their own country, and altogether unacquainted with diſcipline. On the [n] A tranſlation of the declaration delivered by the Auſtrian miniſter reſiding at the Hague to his Serene Highneſs Prince Louis of Brunſwick, in anſwer to that which his Highneſs had delivered on the part of his Britannic majeſty and the King of Pruſſia, on the 25th of November 1759, to the miniſters of the belligerent powers:

THEIR Britannic and Pruſſian majeſties having thought proper to make known, by the declaration delivered, on their part, at the Hague, the 25th of November laſt paſt, to the embaſſadors and miniſters of the courts of Vienna, Peterſburgh, and Verſailles, reſiding there,

'That being ſincerely deſirous of contributing to the re-eſtabliſhment of the public tranquillity they were ready to ſend plenipotentiaries to the place that ſhall be judged the moſt convenient, in order to treat there of this important object with thoſe which the belligerent parties ſhall think proper to authoriſe on their ſide for attaining ſo ſalutary an end;'

Her majeſty the empreſs queen of Hungary and Bohemia, her majeſty the empreſs of all the Ruſſias, and his majeſty the moſt chriſtian king; equally animated by the deſire of contributing to the re-eſtabliſhment of the public tranquillity, on a ſolid and equitable footing, declare in return,

'That his majeſty the catholic king, having been pleaſed to offer his mediation in the war which has ſubſiſted for ſome years between France and England; and this war having, beſides, nothing in common with that which the two empreſſes with their allies having likewiſe carried on for ſome years againſt the king of Pruſſia,

'His moſt chriſtian majeſty is ready to treat of his particular peace with England, through the good offices of his catholic majeſty, whoſe mediation he has a pleaſure in accepting.

'As the war which regards directly his Pruſſian majeſty, their majeſties, the empreſs-queen of Hungary and Bohemia, the empreſs of all the Ruſſias, and the moſt chriſtian king, are diſpoſed to agree to the appointing the congreſs propoſed. But as, by virtue of their treaties, they cannot enter into any engagement relating to peace, but in conjunction with their allies, it will be neceſſary, in order that they may be enabled to explain themſelves definitively upon that ſubject, that their Britannic and Pruſſian majeſties ſhould previouſly be pleaſed to cauſe their invitation to a congreſs to be made to all the powers that are directly engaged in war againſt the king of Pruſſia; and namely, to his majeſty the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, as likewiſe to his majeſty the king of Sweden, who ought ſpecifically to be invited to the future congreſs.'

the 8th day of January M. de St. Germain advanced on the left of the allies, with the grenadiers of the French army, ſupported by eight battalions, and a body of dragoons; but he was encountered by the duke of Holſtein, at the head of a ſtrong detachment, in the neighbourhood of Erſdorff, who, by dint of a furious cannonade obliged him to retreat with precipitation. After this attempt the French parties diſappeared, and their army retired into winter-quarters, in and about Frankfort on the Maine; while prince Ferdinand quartered the allies at Caſſel, Paderborn, Munſter, and Oſnabruck, this laſt place being allotted to the Britiſh troops, as being the neareſt to Embden, where the reenforcements from Britain were to be landed. In the beginning of Frebruary, the prince of Brunſwick, with the detachment of the allied army under his command, began his march from Chemnitz, in Saxony, for Weſtphalia, where he ſafely arrived, after having aſſiſted at a long conference in Hamelen, with his father the reigning duke, his uncle prince Ferdinand, and ſome principal members of the regency of Hanover.

The French general continued to ſend detachments to beat up the quarters of the allies, and lay their towns under contribution. In the beginning of March, the marquis de Blaiſel marched at the head of 2400 men from Gieſſen, where he commanded, to Marpurg, forced the gates of the town, and compelled the garriſon of the allies to take ſhelter in the caſtle. As he could not pretend to undertake the ſiege of the fortreſs, by the fire of which he was exceedingly galled, he demanded of the town a contribution of 100,000 florins, and carried ſome of the magiſtrates along with him, as hoſtages for the payment of this impoſition. He afterwards appeared at Hombourg, Alsfeldt, and Hartzbeg, the frontier poſts of the allies, but did not think proper to attac either, becauſe he perceived that meaſures were taken for his reception. The French, with all their boaſted politeneſs and humanity, are ſometimes found as brutal and rapacious as the moſt barbarous enemy. On pretence of taking umbrage at the town of Hanau-Muntzenberg, for having without their permiſſion, acknowledged the regency of the landgraviate of Heſſe-Caſſel, they, in the month of February, ordered the magiſtrates of that place to pay, within the term of 24 hours the ſum of 750,000 livres, on pain of being ſubjected to plunder. This order was ſignified by the prince de Robecq; to whom the magiſtrates repreſented the impoſſibility of raiſing ſuch a ſum, as the country was totally exhauſted, and their credit abſolutely deſtroyed, in conſequence of their inability to pay the intereſt of the capitals negotiated in the courſe of the preceding year. He ſtill inſiſting upon their finding the money before night, they offered to pay 80,000 florins, which they raiſed with the utmoſt difficulty, and begged the payment of the reſt might be poſtponed for a few weeks; but the requeſt was rejected with diſdain. The garriſon was re-enforced by two battalions, and four ſquadrons diſperſed in the principal ſquares and markets of the city, and the gates were ſhut. They even planted cannon in the ſtreets, and tarred matches were fixed to many houſes, in order to intimidate the inhabitants. Theſe expedients proving ineffectual, detachments of the grenadiers entered the houſes of the principal magiſtrates and merchants, from whence they removed all their beſt effects to the town-hall, where they were kept in depoſit, until they were redeemed with all the money that could poſſibly be raiſed. This exaction, ſo little to the honour of a civilized nation, the French miniſter declared to the diet at Ratiſbon was agreeable to the inſtructions of his moſt chriſtian majeſty.

By way of retaliation for the cruelty practiſed at Hanau, a detachment of the allied army under general Luckner was ſent to raiſe contributions in Fulda, and actually carried off hoſtages from that city; but retired before a ſtrong body of the enemy, who took poſſeſſion of the place. From hence the French marched, in their turn, to plunder the towns of Hirchfeldt and Vacha. Accordingly, they appeared at Vacha, ſituated on the frontiers of Heſſe, and formed the head of the chain of cantonments which the allies had on the Werra. This place was attacked with ſuch vigour, that colonel Freytag, who commanded the poſt, was obliged to abandon the town; but he maintained himſelf on a riſing ground in the neighbourhood, where he amuſed the enemy until two battalions of grenadiers came to his aſſiſtance. Thus re-enforced, he purſued the French for three leagues, and drove them with conſiderable loſs from Gieſſa, where they had reſolved to fix their quarters. Theſe ſkirmiſhes happened in the beginning of May, when the grand armies were juſt in motion to begin the campaign.

By this time the forces under the mareſchal duke de Broglio were augmented to 100,000; while the count de St. Germain commanded a ſeparate army on the Rhine, conſiſting of 30,000 men, aſſembled from the quarters of Duſſeldorp, Cologn, Cleves, and Weſel. The ſecond corps was intended to divide the allied army, which, by ſuch a diviſion, would be conſiderably weakened; and the French court threatened to form a third army, under the prince de Soubiſe; but this did not appear. The duke de Broglio was in ſuch high favour with the French miniſtry at this juncture, that he was promoted over the heads of many old generals, who now demanded and obtained their diſmiſſion; and every ſtep was taken to render the campaign glorious to this admired commander: but, notwithſtanding all their care, and his own exertion, he found it impoſſible to take the field early in the ſeaſon, from want of forage for his cavalry. While his quarters were eſtabliſhed at Franckfort, his troops were plentifully ſupplied with all ſorts of proviſion from the Upper Rhine, but this convenience depended upon his being maſter of the courſe of the river: but he could not move from this poſition without forfeiting the advantage, and providing magazines for the uſe of his forces, ſo that he was obliged to lie inactive until he could have the benefit of green forage in his march. The ſame inconveniencies operated more powerfully on the ſide of prince Ferdinand, who, being in an exhauſted country, was obliged to fall bac as far as Paderborn, and draw his ſupplies from Hamburgh and Bremen on the Elbe and the Weſer. By this time, however, he had received a re-enforcement of Britiſh troops from Embden, under the direction of major-general Griffin; and before the end of the campaign the forces of that nation in Germany were augmented to 25,000; a greater number than had ſerved at one time upon the continent for two centuries. The allied army marched from their cantonments on the 5th day of May, and proceeded by the way of Paderborn to Fritzlar, where, on the 20th, they encamped: but part of the troops left in the biſhopric of Munſter, under general Sporcken, were ordered to form a camp at Dulmen, to make head againſt the French corps commanded by the count de St. Germain.

General Imhoff was ſent with a detachment to Kirchavn on the Orme; and general Gilſoe, with another corps, advanced to the neighbourhood of Hirchfeldt, on the Fulda. The former of theſe having ordered colonel Luckner to ſcour the country with a body of Huſſars, that officer, on the 24th of May, fell in with a French patrole, which gave the alarm at Butzbach, when the garriſon of that place, amounting to 500 piquets, under general Waldenar, fled with great precipitation. Being, however, purſued, and overtaken near a wood, they were routed and diſperſed. Colonel Luckner, entering Butzbach, found a conſiderable quantity of forage, flour, wine, and equipage, belonging to the fugitives. What he could not carry off he diſtributed among the poor inhabitants, and returned to general Imhoff's camp at Ameneburg, with about 100 priſoners. This excurſion alarmed the enemy to ſuch a degree, that their whole army was put in motion; and the duke de Broglio, in perſon, advanced with a large body of troops as far as Friedberg: but underſtanding the allies had not quitted their camp at Fritzlar, he returned to Franckfort, after having cantoned that part of his army in the Wetteraw. This alarm was not ſo mortifying as the ſeceſſion of the Wirtemberg troops, amounting to 10,000 men, commanded by their duke in perſon, who left the French army in diſguſt, and returned to his own country. The imperial army, under the prince de Deuxponts, quartered at Bamberg, began their march to Naumberg on the 20th of May; but one of their detachments of cavalry having received a chec from a body of Pruſſians near Lutzen, they fell bac; and on the 4th day of June encamped at Lichtenfels, upon the Maine. The ſmall detachments of the grand armies, as well as thoſe belonging to the bodies, commanded by general Sporcken and the count de St. Germain, in the neighbourhood of Duſſeldorp, ſkirmiſhed with various ſucceſs. The hereditary prince of Brunſwick being detached from the allied army, with ſome battalions of grenadiers, and two regiments of Engliſh dragoons, advanced to the country of Fulda, where he was joined by the troops under general Gilſoe, and achieved ſome inconſiderable exploits, particularly at Hoſenfeldt and Zielbach, where he ſurpriſed and took divers parties of the enemy.

By the 24th of June, prince Ferdinand, quitting his ſitua-

tion at Fritzlar, marched to Frillendorf, and encamped on the hills between Ziengenheim and Freyſa, general Imhoff commanding at a ſmall diſtance on the right, and the hereditary prince, now returned from Fulda, being poſted on the left of the army. In the mean time, the duke de Broglio, aſſembling his forces between Merlau and Laubach, advanced to Neuſtadt, where he encamped on the 28th day of the month, and at the ſame time occupied a ſtrong poſt at Waſſemburg. His intention was to penetrate through the country of Heſſe into Hanover, and make himſelf entirely maſter of that electorate. With this view he reſolved to effect a junction with the count de St. Germain, whom he directed to advance towards Brilau and Corbach; while he himſelf, decamping from Neuſtadt on the 8th day of July, advanced by the way of Frankenberg. Prince Ferdinand, having received intelligence that the count de St. Germain was in motion, began his march from Ziegenheim, and on the 9th day of July reached the heights of Brunau, in the neighbourhood of Wildungen.

The hereditary prince, at the head of the advanced corps, re-enforced with ſome battalions and ſquadrons under major-general Griffin, was ſent forwards to Saxenhauſen, whither the army followed the next morning. The hereditary prince, continuing to advance, found the enemy already formed at Corbach; but judging their whole force did not exceed 10,000 infantry and 17 ſquadrons, and being impelled by the impetuoſity of his own courage, he reſolved to give them battle. He accordingly attacked them about two in the afternoon, and the action became very warm and obſtinate; but the enemy being continually re-enforced with freſh battalions, and having the advantage of a numerous artillery, all the prince's efforts were ineffectual. Prince Ferdinand, being at too great a diſtance to ſuſtain him, ſent him an order to rejoin the army, which was by this time formed at Saxenhauſen. He forthwith made diſpoſitions for a retreat, which however was attended with great confuſion. The enemy, obſerving the diſorder of the allied troops, plied their artillery with redoubled diligence, while a powerful body of their cavalry charged with great vivacity. In all likelihood the whole infantry of the allies would have been cut off, had not the hereditary prince made a diverſion in their favour, by charging in perſon at the head of the Britiſh dragoons, who acted with their uſual gallantry and effect. This reſpite enabled the infantry to accompliſh their retreat to Saxenhauſen; but they loſt above 500 men, and 15 pieces of cannon. General count Kielmanſegge, major-general Griffin, and major Hill, of Bland's dragoons, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their conduct and intrepidity on this occaſion. The hereditary prince expoſed his life in the hotteſt part of the action, and received a ſlight wound in the ſhoulder, which gave him far leſs diſturbance than he felt from the chagrin and mortification produced by his defeat.

Many days, however, did not paſs, before he found an opportunity of retaliating this diſgrace. Prince Ferdinand, receiving advice that a body of the enemy, commanded by major-general Glaubitz, had advanced on the left of the allies to Ziegenheim, detached the hereditary prince to oppoſe them, at the head of ſix battalions of Hanoverians and Heſſians, with Elliot's regiment of Engliſh light-horſe, Luckner's huſſars, and two brigades of chaſſeurs; on the 16th day of the month, he engaged the enemy near the village of Exdorff, and a very warm action enſued, in which Elliot's regiment ſignalized themſelves remarkably by repeated charges[o]. At length victory declared for the allies. Five battalions of the enemy, including the commander in chief, and the prince of Anhalt Cothen, were taken, with ſix pieces of cannon, all their arms, baggage, and artillery. During theſe tranſactions, the mareſchal duke de Broglio remained encamped on the heights of Corbach. He had, in advancing from Franckfort, left detachments to reduce the caſtles of Marpourg and Dillembourg, which were occupied by the allies, and they fell into his hands, the garriſons of both being obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. Theſe were but inconſiderable conqueſts; nor did the progreſs of the French general equal the idea which had been formed of his talents and activity. The count de St. Germain, who was his ſenior officer, and believed by many to be at leaſt his equal in capacity, having now joined his corps to the grand army, and conceiving diſguſt at his being obliged to ſerve under the duke de Broglio, relinquiſhed his command, in which he was ſucceeded by the chevalier de Muy. At the ſame time, the marquis de Voyer, and the count de Luc, two generals of experience and reputation, quitted the army, and returned to France, actuated by the ſame motives.

The allied army having moved their camp, from Saxenhauſen to the village of Kalle, near Caſſel, remained in that ſituation till the 30th day of July, when the troops were again put in motion. The chevalier de Muy, having paſſed the Dymel at Stradtbergen, with the reſerve of the French army, amounting to 35,000 men, and extending this body down the banks of the river, in order to cut off the communication of the allies with Weſtphalia; while the duke de Broglio marched up with his main wing to their camp at Kalle, and prince Xavier of Saxony, who commanded their reſerve on the left, advanced towards Caſſel; prince Ferdinand, leaving general Kielmanſegge with a body of troops for the defence of this city, decamped in the night of the 30th, and paſſed the Dymel without loſs, between Gibenau and Dringleberg. The hereditary prince, who had the preceding day paſſed the ſame river, in order to re-enforce general Sporcken, who was poſted near Corbeke, now reconnoitred the poſition of the enemy, and found them poſſeſſed of a very advantageous camp between Warbourg and Ochſendorff. Prince Ferdinand having reſolved to attac them, ordered the hereditary prince and general Sporcken to turn their left, while he himſelf advanced againſt their front, with the main body of the army. The enemy was accordingly attacked, almoſt at the ſame inſtant, both in flank and in rear, with equal impetuoſity and ſucceſs. As the infantry of the allied army could not march faſt enough to charge at the ſame time, the marquis of Granby was ordered to advance with the cavalry of the right; and the brigade of Engliſh artillery, commanded by captain Phillips, made ſuch expedition, that they were up in time to ſecond the attac in a moſt ſurpriſing manner. The French cavalry, though very numerous, retreated at the approach of the marquis, except three ſquadrons, who ſtood the charge, and were immediately broken. Then the Engliſh horſe fell upon the enemy's infantry, which ſuffered greatly, while the town of Warbourg was aſſaulted by the Britannic legion. The French, finding themſelves hard preſſed on both flanks, as well as in front and rear, retired precipitately, with conſiderable damage, occaſioned chiefly by the Britiſh cannon and dragoons, and many were drowned in attempting to ford the Dymel. The battalion of Maxwell, and a brigade under colonel Beckwith, compoſed of grenadiers and highlanders, diſtinguiſhed themſelves remarkably on this occaſion. The enemy left about 1500 men, killed or wounded, on the field of battle; with ſome colours, and ten pieces of cannon; and about the ſame number were made priſoners. Monſieur de Muy lay all night under arms, on the heights of Volk-Miſſen, from whence he next day retired towards Wolfshagen. On the evening of the battle the marquis of Granby received orders to paſs the river in purſuit of them, with twelve Britiſh battalions, and ten ſquadrons, and encamped at Wilda, about four miles from Warbourg, the heights of which were poſſeſſed by the enemy's grand army[p]. By this ſucceſs, prince

[o] Though this was the firſt time that Elliot's regiment appeared in the field, it performed wonders. They charged five different times, and broke through the enemy at every charge: but theſe exploits they did not achieve without ſuſtaining a heavy loſs in officers, men, and horſes.

[p] Copy of a letter from the Marquis of Granby, to the earl of Hoderneſſe.

My Lord,

IT is with the greateſt ſatisfaction that I have the honour of acquainting your lordſhip of the ſucceſs of the hereditary prince yeſterday morning.

General Sporcken's corps marched from the camp at Kalle to Liebenau, about four in the afternoon of the 29th; the hereditary prince followed the ſame evening, with a body of troops, among which were the two Engliſh battalions of grenadiers, the two of highlanders, and four ſquadrons of dragoons, Cope's and Conway's.

The army was under arms all day on the 30th, and, about 11 at night, marched off in ſix columns to Libenau. About five the next morning, the whole army aſſembled, and formed on the heights near Corbeke. The hereditary prince was, at this time, marching in two columns, in order to turn the enemy's left flank; which he did by marching to Donhelbourg, leaving Klein-Eder on his left, and forming in two lines, with his left towards Doſſel, and his right near Grimbeck, oppoſite to the left flank of the enemy, whoſe poſition was with the left to the high hill near Offendorff, and their right to Warbourg, into which place they had flung Fiſcher's corps. The hereditary prince immediately attacked the enemy's flank, and after a very ſharp diſpute, obliged them to give way, and, by a continual fire, kept forcing them to fall bac upon Warbourg. The army was, at this time, marching with the greateſt diligence to attac the enemy in front; but the infantry could not get up in time; general Waldegrave, at the head of the Britiſh, preſſed their march as much as poſſible: no troops could ſhow more eagerneſs to get up than they ſhowed. Many of the men, from the heat of the weather, and over-ſtraining themſelves to get on through moraſſy and very difficult ground, ſuddenly dropped down on their march.

General Moſtyn, who was at the head of the Britiſh cavalry that was formed on the right of our infantry on the other ſide of a large wood, upon receiving the duke's orders to come up with the cavalry as faſt as poſſible, made ſo much expedition, bringing them up at a full trot, though the diſtance was near five miles, that the Britiſh cavalry had the happineſs to arrive in time to ſhare the glory of the day, having ſucceſsfully charged ſeveral times both the enemy's cavalry and infantry.

Ferdinand was enabled to maintain his communication with Weſtphalia, and keep the enemy at a diſtance from the heart of Hanover; but to theſe objects he ſacrificed the country of Caſſel: for prince Xavier of Saxony, at the head of a detached body, much more numerous than that which was left under general Kielmanſegge, advanced towards Caſſel, and made himſelf maſter of that city; then he reduced Munden, Gottingen, and Eimbeck, in the electorate of Hanover. All that prince Ferdinand could do, conſidering how much he was out-numbered by the French, was to ſecure poſts and paſſes, with a view to retard their progreſs, and employ detachments to harraſs and ſurpriſe their advanced parties. In a few days after the action at Warbourg, general Luckner repulſed a French detachment, which had advanced as far as Eimbeck, and ſurpriſed another at Nordheim. At the ſame period, colonel Donap, with a body of the allied army, attacked a French, corps of 2000 men, poſted in the wood of Sababourg, to preſerve the communication between their grand army and their troops on the other ſide of the Weſer; and, notwithſtanding the ſtrength of their ſituation, drove them from their poſt, with the loſs of 500 men, either killed or made priſoners; but this advantage was overbalanced by the reduction of Ziegenheim, garriſoned by 700 men of the allied army, who, after a vigorous reſiſtance, were obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war.

On the 5th day of Auguſt, prince Ferdinad being encamped at Buhne, received intelligence that a conſiderable body of the enemy, amounting to upwards of 20,000 men, were in motion to make a general forage in the neighbourhood of Geiſmar. He paſſed the Dymel early in the morning, with a body of troops, and ſome artillery, and poſted them in ſuch a manner, as to render the enemy's attempt totally ineffectual, although the foragers were covered with great part of their army. On the ſame morning the hereditary prince ſet out on an expedition to beat up the quarters of a French detachment. Being informed that the volunteers of Clermont and Dauphiné, to the number of 1000 horſe and foot, were cantoned at Zierenberg, at a ſmall diſtance from the French camp at Dieremberg, and paſſed their time in the moſt careleſs ſecurity, he advanced towards them from his camp at Warbourg, within a league of their cantonment, without ſeeing any of their poſts, or meeting with any of their patroles; a circumſtance that encouraged him to beat up their quarters by ſurpriſe: for this ſervice he pitched upon five battalions, with a detachment of highlanders, and eight regiments of dragoons. Leaving their tents ſtanding, they began their march at eight in the evening, and paſſed the Dymel near Warbourg. About a league on the other ſide of the Dymel, at the village of Witzen, they were joined by the light troops under major Bulow; and now the diſpoſition was made, both for entering the town, and ſecuring a retreat, in caſe of being repulſed. When they were within two miles of Zierenberg, and in ſight of the fires of the enemy's grand guard, the grenadiers of Maxwell, the regiment of Kingſley, and the highlanders, advanced by three ſeparate roads, and marched in profound ſilence: at length the noiſe of their feet alarmed the French, who began to fire; then the grenadiers proceeded at a round pace with unloaded firelocks, puſhed the piquets, ſlew the guard at the gate, and ruſhing into the town, drove every thing before them with incredible impetuoſity. The attac was ſo ſudden, and the ſurpriſe ſo great, that the French had not time to aſſemble in any conſiderable number; but they began to fire from the windows, and in ſo doing, exaſperated the allied troops, who, burſting into the houſes, ſlaughtered them without mercy. Having remained in the place from two till three in the morning, they retreated with about 400 priſoners, including 40 officers; and brought off two pieces of artillery. This nocturnal adventure, in which the Britiſh troops diſplayed equal courage and activity, was achieved with very little loſs; but, after all, it deſerves no other appellation than that of a partizan exploit, for it was attended with no ſort of advantage to the allied army.

Conſidering the ſuperiority of the French army, we cannot account for the little progreſs made by the duke de Broglio, who, according to our conception, might either have given battle to the allies with the utmoſt probability of ſucceſs; or penetrated into the heart of Hanover, the conqueſt of which ſeemed to be the principal object of the French miniſtry. Inſtead of ſtriking an important ſtroke, he retired from Immenhauſen towards Caſſel, where he fortified his camp as if he had thought himſelf in danger of being attacked; and the war was carried on by ſmall detachments. Major Bulow, being ſent with a ſtrong party from the camp of the allied army at Buline, ſurpriſed the town of Marpug, deſtroyed the French ovens, and brought off a conſiderable quantity of ſtores and baggage, with ſome priſoners. He met with the ſame ſucceſs at Butzbach, where he ſurpriſed and took two companies belonging to the regiment of Raugrave, and retired with his body to Franckenberg, where he joined colonel Forſen. On the 12th day of September they made a movement towards Franckenau; and M. de Stainville, who was poſted with a body of French troops at Mardenhagen, advanced to chec their progreſs. He came up with their rear in the neighbourhood of Munden, and attacked them in paſſing the river Orck with ſuch vigour, that Forſen, with ſome of his cavalry, was taken, and Bulow obliged to abandon ſome pieces of cannon. The action was juſt determined, when this laſt was re-enforced by the hereditary prince of Brunſwick, who had made a forced march of five German miles, which had fatigued the troops to ſuch a degree, that he deferred his attac till next morning; but in the mean time, mr. de Stainville retired towards Franckenberg. The Hanoverian general Wangenheim, at the head of four battalions and ſix ſquadrons, had driven the enemy from the defile of Soheite, and encamped at Lawenthagen; but being attacked by a ſuperior number, he was obliged, in his turn, to give way, and his retreat was not effected without the loſs of 200 men, and ſome pieces of artillery. When the enemy retired, general Wangenheim repaſſed the Weſer, and occupied his former ſituation at Uffar. Mean while, general Luckner gained an advantage over a detachment of French cavalry near Norten. Prince Ferdinand, when mareſchal Broglio quitted his camp at Immenhauſen, made a motion of his troops, and eſtabliſhed his head-quarters at Geiſmar-wells, the reſidence of the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel; from thence, however, he tranſferred them, about the latter end of September, to Ovilgune, on the Weſtphalia ſide of the Dymel.

Such was the poſition of the two oppoſite grand armies, when the world was ſurpriſed by an expedition to the Lower Rhine, made by the Hereditary Prince of Brunſwick. Whether this excurſion was intended to hinder the French from re-enforcing their army in Weſtphalia, or to co-operate in the Low Countries with the armament now ready equipped in the ports of England; or to gratify the ambition of a young prince, overboiling with courage, and glowing with the deſire of conqueſt, we cannot explain to the ſatisfaction of the reader: certain it is, the Auſtrian Netherlands were, at this juncture, entirely deſtitute of troops, except the French garriſons of Oſtend and Nieuport, which were weak and inconſiderable. Had 10,000 Engliſh troops been landed on the coaſt of Blankenburg, they might have taken poſſeſſion of Bruges, Ghent, Bruſſels, and Antwerp, without reſiſtance, and joned the hereditary prince in the heart of the country: in that caſe he would have found himſelf at the head of 30,000 men, and might have made ſuch a diverſion in favour of Hanover, as to transfer the ſeat of war from Weſtphalia into Flanders. The empreſs-queen might, indeed, have complained of this invaſion, as the formality of declaring war againſt her had not been obſerved by Great-Britain; but, conſidering that ſhe was the declared enemy of Hanover, and had violated the barrier treaty, in eſtabliſhing which the kingdom of Great-Britain had laviſhed away ſo much blood and treaſure, a ſtep of this kind, we apprehend, might have been taken, without any imputation of perfidy or injuſtice. Whatever the motives of the prince's expedition might have been, he certainly quitted the grand army of the

I ſhould do injuſtice to the general officers, to every officer and private man of the cavaly, if I did not beg your lordſhip would aſſure his majeſty, that nothing could exceed their gallant behaviour on that occaſion.

Captain Phillips made ſo much expedition with his cannon, as to have an opportunity, by a ſevere cannonade, to oblige thoſe who had paſſed the Dymel, and were formed on the other ſide, to retire with the utmoſt precipitation.

I received his ſerene highneſs's orders yeſterday, in the evening, to paſs the river after them, with the 12 Britiſh battalions, and 10 ſquadrons, and am now encamped upon the heights of Wilda, about four miles from Warbourg, on the heights of which their grand army is encamped.

M. de Muy is now retiring from the heights of Volk-Miſſen, where he lay under arms laſt night, towards Wolfenhagen. I cannot give your lordſhip an account of the loſs on either ſide. Captain Faucitt, whom I ſend off with this, ſhall get all the intelligence he can upon this head, before he ſets off.

I am, &c,

GRANBY.

Saturday morning, ſix o'clock.

P. S.——As I had not an opportunity of ſending off captain Faucitt ſo ſoon as I intended, I opened my letter, to acquaint your lordſhip that I have juſt joined the grand army with my detachment.

allies in the month of September, and traverſing Weſtphalia, with 20 battalions, and as many ſquadrons, appeared on the Lower Rhine, marching by Schermbeck and Duſſeldorp. On the 29th day of the month, he ſent a large detachment over the river at Rocroot, which ſurpriſed part of the French partiſan Fiſcher's corps at Rhynberg, and ſcoured the country. Next day, other parties, croſſing at Rees and Emmerick, took poſſeſſion of ſome redoubts which the French had raiſed along the bank of the river; and here they found a number of boats, ſufficicient to tranſport the reſt of the forces. Then the prince advanced to Cleves, and at his approach the French garriſon, conſiſting of 500 men under the command of M. de Barral, retired into the caſtle, which, however, they did not long defend; for on the 3d day of October they capitulated, and ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, after having in vain endeavoured to obtain more favourable conditions.

A more important object was Weſel, which the prince inveſted, and began to beſiege in form. The approaches were made on the right of the Rhine, while the prince in perſon remained on the left, to cover the ſiege; and kept his communication open with the other ſide, by a bridge above, and another below the place. He had hoped to carry it by a vigorous exertion, without the formality of a regular ſiege, but he met with a warmer reception than he expected; and his operations were retarded by heavy rains, which, by ſwelling the river, endangered his bridges and laid his trenches under water. The difficulties and delays occaſioned by this circumſtance entirely fruſtrated his deſign. The French, being made acquainted with his motions, were not ſlow in taking meaſures to anticipiate his ſucceſs. M. de Caſtries was detached after him with 30 battalions, and 38 ſquadrons; and, by forced marches, arrived on the 14th day of October, at Rhynberg, where the prince's light troops were poſted. Theſe he attacked immediately, and compelled to abandon the poſt, notwithſtanding all the efforts of the prince, who commanded in perſon, and appeared in the warmeſt parts of this ſhort, but ſanguinary affair. The enemy having five battalions, with ſome ſquadrons, at Rhynberg, marched by the left, and encamped behind the convent of Campen. The prince having received intimation that M. de Caſtries was not yet joined by ſome re-enforcements that were on the march, determined to be beforehand with them, and attempt that very night to ſurpriſe him in his camp. For this purpoſe he began his march at ten in the evening, after having left four battalions, and five ſquadrons, under general Bock, with inſtructions to obſerve Rhynberg, and attac that poſt, in caſe the attem t on Campen ſhould ſucceed. Before the allied forces ſhould reach the enemy's camp, they were under the .neceſſity of overpowering Fiſcher's corps of irregulars, which occupied the convent of Campen, at the diſtance of half a league in their front. This ſervice occaſioned ſome firing, the noiſe of which alarmed the French army. The commander formed them with great expedition, and poſted them in a wood, where they were immediately attacked, and at firſt obliged to give ground; but they ſoon retrieved all they had loſt, and ſuſtained without flinching an unceaſing fire of muſquetry, from five in the morning till nine at night, when they reaped the fruits of their perſeverance. The hereditary prince, whoſe horſe was killed under him, ſeeing no proſpect of ſucceſs in prolonging an action which had already coſt him a conſiderable number of men, thought proper to give orders for a retreat, which was not effected without confuſion, and left the field of battle to the enemy. His loſs, on this occaſion, did not fall ſhort of 16,000 choice men, killed, wounded, and taken; and this loſs fell chiefly on the troops of Great-Britain, who were almoſt found in the foremoſt ranks of danger. All the officers, both of infantry and dragoons, diſtinguiſhed themſelves remarkably, and many were dangerouſly wounded. Among theſe, the nation regretted the loſs of lord Downe, whoſe wounds proved mortal: he was a young nobleman of ſpirit, who had lately embraced a military life, though he was not regularly trained in the ſervice.

Next day, which was the 16th of October, the enemy attacked an advanced body of the allies, which was poſted in a wood before Elverick, and extended along the Rhine. The firing of cannon and muſquetry was maintained till night. Mean while, a column of the French infantry, commanded by M. de Cabot, marched through Walach, and took poſt among the thickets, at the diſtance of a quarter of a league, in the front of the prince's army. By this time the Rhine was ſo much ſwelled by the rains, and the banks of it were overflowed in ſuch a manner, that it was neceſſary to repair and move lower down the bridge which had been thrown over that river. This work was accordingly performed in the preſence of the enemy, and the prince, paſſing without moleſtation, proceeded to Bruynen, where he fixed his head-quarters. His paſſing the Rhine ſo eaſily, under the eye of a victorious army, ſo much ſuperior to him in number, may be accounted among the fortunate incidents of his life. Such was the iſſue of an expedition, which expoſed the projector of it to the imputation of temerity. Whatever his aim might have been, beſides the reduction of Weſel, with the ſtrength of which he did not ſeem to have been very well acquainted, he certainly miſcarried in his deſign, and his miſcarriage was attended with a very conſiderable loſs of troops, occaſioned not only by the action, but alſo by the diſeaſes engendered from the wet weather, the fatigue of long marches, and the want of proper conveniences, not to mention the enormous expence in contingencies, incurred by this fruitleſs undertaking.

In the month of November, while he lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Schermback, a body of the enemy attempted to beat up his quarters: having received intimation of their deſign, he immediately called in his advanced poſts, and made a diſpoſition for giving them a proper reception. He abandoned the tents that were in the front of his camp, and poſted his infantry in ambuſcade behind thoſe that were in the rear: at the ſame time he ordered ſome regiments of horſe and huſſars to fetch a compaſs, and fall upon the bac of the enemy. This ſtratagem ſucceeded to his wiſh. The French detachment, believing the allies had actually abandoned their camp, began to pillage the tents in the utmoſt diſorder: then the infantry ſallied from the place where they were concealed, and fell upon them with great impetuoſity: the artillery opened, and the cavalry charged them in flank. In a word, of 1200 who marched from Weſel on this expedition, ſcarce 200 eſcaped.

The duke de Broglio endeavoured, by ſundry means, to take advantage of the allied army on the other ſide of the Weſer, thus weakened by the abſence of the troops under the hereditary prince; but he found prince Ferdinand too vigilant to be ſurpriſed, and too ſtrongly ſituated to be attacked with any proſpect of ſucceſs. He, therefore, contented himſelf with ravaging the country by detachments: he ſent M. de Stainville, with a conſiderable body of forces, to penetrate into the heart of Hanover; and on the 15th day of September, that officer falling in with a detachment of the allies, commanded by major Bulow, attaced them near the abbey of Schaken. After a warm and obſtinate engagement, they were defeated, and driven to Bulemont, with the loſs of their cannon, baggage, and a good number of men, who fell into the hands of the victors. After this exploit, M. de Stainville advanced to Halberſtadt, and demanded of that capital a contribution of 1,500,000 livres: but the citizens had been ſo drained by former exactions, that they could not raiſe above 30,000: for the remainder, the French partizen took hoſtages, with whom he returned to the grand army encamped at Caſſel, from whence they, in a little time, fell bac as far as Gottengen.

As the enemy retreated prince Ferdinand advanced as far as Hurſte, where he eſtabliſhed his head-quarters about the latter end of November. While he remained in this poſition, divers ſkermiſhes happened in ths neighbourhood of Gottingen. Major-general Breidenbach, at the head of two regiments of Hanoverian and Brunſwick guards, with a detachment of cavaly, attacked on the 29th day of November, the French poſt at Heydemunden, upon the river Worrau. This he carried, took poſſeſſion of the town, which the enemy haſtily abandoned. Part of their detachment croſſed the river in boats; the reſt threw themſelves into an entrenchment that coverered the paſſage, which the allies endeavoured to force in ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, galled as they were by the fire of the enemy's redoubts on the other ſide of the river. At length M. Breidenbach was obliged to deſiſt, and fall bac into the town, from whence he retired at midnight, after having ſuſtained conſiderable damage. Prince Ferdinand had it very much at heart to drive the French from Gottengen, and accordingly inveſted the city: but the French garriſon, which was numerous, and well provided, made ſuch a vigorous defence, as baffled all the endeavours of the allies, who were moreover impeded by the rainy weather, which, added to their conſideration, prevented them from undertaking the ſiege in form. Nevertheleſs, they kept the place blocked up from the 22d day of November to the 12th of the following month, when the garriſon, in a deſperate ſally, took one of their principal poſts, and compelled them to raiſe the blockade. About the middle of December, prince Ferdinand retired into winter quarters, he himſelf reſiding at Uſlar, and the Engliſh troops being cantoned in the biſhopric of Paderborn. Thus, the enemy were left in poſſeſſion of Heſſe, and the whole country eaſtward of the Weſer, to the frontiers of the electorate of Hanover. If the allied army had not been weakened, for the ſake of a raſh, ill-concerted, and unſucceſsful expedition to the Lower-Rhine, in all probability the French would have been obliged to abandon the footing they had gained in the courſe of this campaign, and in particular to retreat from Gottingen, which they now maintained and fortified with great diligence and circumſpection.

The king of Pruſſia, after all his labours, notwithſtanding the great talents he had diſplayed, and the incredible efforts he had made, ſtill found himſelf ſurrounded by his enemies, and in danger of being cruſhed by their cloſing, and contracting their circle. Even the Swedes, who had languiſhed ſo long, ſeemed to be rouſed to exertion in Pomerania, during the ſeverity of the winter ſeaſon. The Pruſſian general, Manteuffel, had, on the 20th day of January, paſſed the river Peene, overthrown the advanced poſts of the enemy at Ziethen, and penetrated as far as the neighbourhood of Greiffewalde; but finding the Swedes on their guard, he returned to Anclam, where his head-quarters were eſtabliſhed. This inſult was ſoon retaliated with intereſt. On the 28th day of the month, at five in the morning, a body of Swedes attacked the Pruſſian troops poſted in the ſuburbs of Anclam, on the other ſide of the Peene, and drove them into the city, which they entered pell-mell. General Manteuffel, being alarmed, endeavoured to rally the troops, but was wounded and taken, with about 200 men, and three pieces of cannon. The victors, having achieved this exploit, returned to their own quarters. As for the Ruſſian army, which had wintered on the other ſide of the Viſtula, the ſeaſon was pretty far advanced before it could take the field; though general Tottleben was detached from it, about the beginning of June, at the head of 10,000 Coſſacs, and other light troops, with which he made an irruption into Pomerania, and eſtabliſhed his head quartets at Belgard.

At the beginning of the campaign the king of Pruſſia's chief aim was to take meaſures for the preſervation of Sileſia, the conqueſt of which ſeemed to be the principal object with the court of Vienna. While the Auſtrian army, under mareſchal count Daun, lay ſtrongly entrenched in the neighbourhood of Dreſden, the king of Pruſſia had endeavoured, in the month of December, to make him quit that advantageous ſituation, by cutting off his proviſions, and making an irruption into Bohemia. For theſe purpoſes he had taken poſſeſſion of Dippeſwalde, Maxen, and Pretchendorff, as if he intended to enter Bohemia by the way of Paſsberg: but this ſcheme being found impracticable, he returned to his camp at Freyberg; and in January the Pruſſian and Auſtrian armies were cantoned ſo near each other, that daily ſkirmiſhes were fought with various ſucceſs. The head of the Pruſſian camp was formed by a body of 4000 men under general Zettwitz, who, on the 29th day of January, was attacked with ſuch impetuoſity by the Auſtrian general, Bec, that he retreated in great confuſion to Torgau, with the loſs of 500 men, eight pieces of artillery, and a conſiderable quantity of new clothing, and other baggage. Another advantage of the ſame nature was gained at Neuſtadt over a ſmall body of Pruſſians who occupied that city. In the month of March general Laudohn advanced with a ſtrong detachment of horſe and foot, in order to ſurpriſe the Pruſſians, who, in attempting to effect a retreat to Steinau, were ſurrounded accordingly, and very roughly handled. General Laudohn ſummoned them twice by ſound of trumpet to lay down their arms; but their commanders, the captains Blumenthal and Zettwitz, rejecting the propoſal with diſdain, the enemy attacked them on all hands with a great ſuperiority of number. In this emergency the Pruſſian captains formed their troops into a ſquare, and by a cloſe continued fire kept the enemy at bay; until, perceiving that the Croats had taken poſſeſſion of a wood between Siebenhauſen and Steinau, they, in apprehenſion of being intercepted, abandoned their baggage, and forced their way to Steinau, which they reached with great difficulty, having been continually harraſſed by the Auſtrians, who paid dear for this advantage. Several other petty exploits of this kind were achieved by detachments on both ſides, before the campaign was begun by the grand armies.

Towards the end of April the king of Pruſſia altered his poſition, and withdrew that part of his chain of cantonments extending from the foreſt of Thurundt to the right of the Elbe. He now took poſſeſſion of a very ſtrong camp between the Elbe and the Mulda, which he entrenched in every part that was acceſſible, and fortified with 250 pieces of cannon. By theſe precautions he was enabled to keep his ground againſt the army of count Daun, and at the ſame time detach a body of troops, as a re-enforcement to his brother prince Henry, who aſſembled a ſeparate army near Franckfort upon the Oder, that he might be at hand either to oppoſe the Ruſſians, or march to the relief of Sileſia, which the enemy was bent upon invading. It was for this purpoſe that the Auſtrian general, Laudohn, advanced with a conſiderable army into Luſatia about the beginning of May, and general Beck, with another body of troops, took poſſeſſion of Cotbus: mean while count Daun continued in his old ſituation on the Elbe; general Lacy formed a ſmall detached army upon the frontiers of Saxony, to the ſouthward of Dreſden; and the prince de Deuxponts marched into the ſame neighbourhood with the army of the empire. Prince Henry of Pruſſia, having encamped with his army for ſome time at Sagan, in Sileſia, moved from thence to Gorlitz in Luſatia, to obſerve the motions of general Laudohn, encamped at Koningſgratz; from whence, in the beginning of June, he marched into the country of Glatz, and advanced to the neighbourhood of Schweidnitz, which he ſeemed determined to beſiege, having a train of eight pieces of cannon. With a view to thwart his deſigns, prince Henry re enforced the body of troops under general Fouquet; and at the ſame time he ſent a detachment into Pomerania, under colonel Leſſow, who defeated the rear-guard of general Tottleben, and compelled that officer to evacuate Pomerania. By this time, however, mareſchal Soltikoff had arrived from Peterſbugh, and taken the command of the grand Ruſſian army, which paſſed the Viſtula in June, and began its march towards the frontiers of Sileſia.

In the month of June general Laudohn made an unſucceſsful attempt to carry Glatz by aſſault: but he ſucceeded better in his next enterprize. Underſtanding that general Fouquet, who occupied the poſt at Landſhut, had weakened himſelf by ſending off detachments under the major-generals Ziethen and Grant, he reſolved to attac him with ſuch a ſuperiority of number, that he ſhould not be able to reſiſt. Accordingly, on the 23d day of June, at two in the morning, he began the aſſault with his whole army upon ſome redoubts which Foquet occupied, and theſe were carried one after another, though not without a very deſperate oppoſition. General Foquet being ſummoned to ſurrender, refuſed to ſubmit; and having received two wounds, was at length taken priſoner: about 3000 of his men eſcaped to Breſlau; the reſt were killed or taken; but the loſs of the victors is ſaid to have exceeded that of the vanquiſhed. In July general Laudohn undertook the ſiege of Glatz, which was taken after a very faint reſiſtance: for, on the very day the batteries were opened againſt the place, the garriſon abandoned part of the fortifications, which the beſiegers immediately occupied. The Pruſſians made repeated efforts to regain the ground they had loſt; but they were repulſed in all their attempts. At length the garriſon laid down their arms, and ſurrendered at diſcretion. From this tame behaviour of the Pruſſians, one would imagine the garriſon muſt have been very weak, a circumſtance which we cannot reconcile with the known ſagacity of the Pruſſian monarch, as the place was of great importance, on account of the immence magazine it contained, including above 100 braſs cannon, a great number of mortars, and a vaſt quantity of ammunition.

Laudohn encouraged by this ſucceſs at Glatz, advanced immediately to Breſlau, which he began to bombard with great fury [q]; but, before he could make a regular attac, he found himſelf obliged to retire. Prince Henry of Pruſſia,

[q] The Germans are in general but indifferent engineers, and little acquainted with the art of beſieging. On this occaſion the Auſtrian general had no other proſpect than that of carrying the place by a ſudden attac, or intimidating count Tavenzein, the governor, to an immediate ſurrender; for he knew the Ruſſian army was at a conſiderable diſtance, and judged from the character of prince Henry of Pruſſia, that he would advance to the relief of the place long before it could be taken according to the uſual forms. Influenced by theſe conſiderations, when he had inveſted the town, he ſent a letter to the governor, ſpecifying, that his army conſiſted of 50 battalions, and 80 ſquadrons; that the Ruſſian army, amounting to 70,000 men, was within three days march of Breſlau; that no ſuccour could be expected from the king of Pruſſia, encamped as he was on the other ſide of the Elbe, and one of the moſt accompliſhed generals which this age produced, having received repeated intelligence that the Ruſſian army intended to join Laudohn at Breſlau, reſolved to advance and give them battle before the purpoſed junction. In the latter end of July he began his march from Gleiſſen, and on the laſt day of that month had reached Linden, near Slauve, where he underſtood that Tottleben's detachment only had paſſed through the plains of Polnich-Liſſa, and that the grand Ruſſian army had marched through Koſten and Guſtin. The prince, finding it impoſſible to purſue them by that rout, directed his march to Glogau, where he learned that Breſlau was beſieged by general Laudohn, and immediately advanced by forced marches to its relief. Such was his expedition, that in five days he marched above 120 Engliſh miles, and at his approach the Auſtrian general abandoned his enterprize. Thus, by his prudence and activity, he not only prevented the junction of the Ruſſian and Auſtrian armies, but alſo ſaved the capital of Sileſia, and hampered Laudohn in ſuch a manner as ſubjected him to a defeat by the Pruſſian monarch, to whoſe motions we ſhall now turn our attention.

Whether his deſign was originally upon Dreſden, or he purpoſed to co-operate with his brother prince Henry in Sileſia, which his adverſaries ſeemed to have pitched upon as the ſcene of their operations, we cannot preſume to determine; but certain it is, he, in the beginning of July, began his march in two columns through Luſatia, and count Daun being informed of his march, ordered his army to be put in motion. Leaving the army of the empire, and the body of troops under Lacy, to guard Saxony in his abſence, he marched with great expedition towards Sileſia, in full perſuaſion that the Pruſſian monarch had thither directed his rout. On the 7th day of July, the king, knowing that Daun was now removed at a diſtance, repaſſed the Pulſnitz, which he had paſſed but two days before, and advanced with the van of his army towards Lichtenberg, in order to attac the forces of general Lacy, who was poſted there; but the Auſtrian retired at his approach. Then the army marched to Marienſtern, where the king having received intelligence that count Daun was in full march for Lauban, having already gained two marches upon the Pruſſians. Perhaps it was this intimation that determined the king to change his plan and return to the Elbe. On the 8th day of the month he repaſſed the Sprehe, in the neighbourhood of Beautzen, and marched towards Dreſden with extraordinary diligence. On the 13th, his army having paſſed the Elbe at Kadetz, on a bridge of boats, encamped between Pirna and Dreſden, which laſt he reſolved to beſiege, in hopes of reducing it before count Daun could return to its relief. How far this expectation was well grounded, we muſt leave the reader to judge, after having obſerved, that the place was now much more defenſible than it had been when the laſt attempt of the Auſtrians upon it miſcarried; that it was ſecured with a numerous garriſon, commanded by general Macguire, an officer of courage and experience. This governor being ſummoned to ſurrender, anſwered, that having the honour to be entruſted with the defence of the capital, he would maintain it to the laſt extremity. Batteries were immediately raiſed againſt the town on both ſides of the Elbe; and the poor inhabitants ſubjected to a dreadful viſitation, that their calamities might either drive them to deſpair, or move the heart of the governor to embrace articles of capitulation: but theſe expedients proved ineffectual. Though the ſuburbs towards the Pirna gate were attacked and carried, this advantage made no impreſſion on general Macguire, who made ſeveral vigorous ſallies, and took every neceſſary precaution for the defence of the city, encouraged moreover by the vicinity of Lacy's body and the army of the empire, encamped in an advantageous poſition near Gros Seydlitz; and confident that count Daun would haſten to his relief. In this hope he was not diſappointed; the Auſtrian general, finding himſelf duped by the ſtratagem of the Pruſſian monarch, and being made acquainted with this enterprize againſt Dreſden, inſtantly wheeled about, and marched bac with ſuch rapidity, that on the 19th day of the month he reached the neighbourhood of the capital of Saxony. In conſequence of his approach the king of Pruſſia, whoſe heavy artillery was now arrived, redoubled his efforts againſt the city, ſo as to reduce to aſhes the cathedral church, the new ſquare, ſeveral noble ſtreets, ſome palaces, together with the curious manufactory of porcelaine. His vengeance muſt have been levelled againſt the citizens; for it affected neither the fortifications, nor the Auſtrian garriſon, which count Daun found means to re-enforce with 16 battalions. This ſupply, and the neighbourhood of three hoſtile armies, rendered it altogether impoſſible to proſecute the ſiege with any proſpect of ſucceſs: the king, therefore, abandoned the undertaking, withdrew his troops and artillery, and endeavoured to bring Daun to a battle, which that general cautiouſly avoided.

The fate of this prince ſeemed now at its criſis. Notwithſtanding all the efforts of his brother prince Henry, the Ruſſians were faſt advancing to join Laudohn, who had already blocked up Schweidnitz and Neiſs, and their junction ſeemed to threaten the loſs of all Sileſia. The king had nothing to oppoſe to ſuperior numbers, but ſuperior activity, of which he determined to avail himſelf without delay. Inſtead of making a feint towards Sileſia, he reſolved to march thither in earneſt; and for that purpoſe, croſſing the Elbe, encamped at Dallwitz, on the farther bank of the river, leaving general Hulſen, with 15,000 men, in the entrenched camp of Schlettow, to maintain his footing in Saxony. On the 3d day of Auguſt he began his march for Sileſia, followed by count Daun with the grand Auſtrian army, while the detached body under Lacy, took poſt at Rechenberg, and the imperial army encamped at Keffeldorf. Both the Pruſſians and Auſtrians marched at the rate of 100 miles in five days: on the 10th the king took poſſeſſion of the camp of Lignitz; and here he ſeemed in danger of being quite ſurrounded by the enemy, who occupied the whole ground between Parchwitz and Coſſendau, an extent of 30 miles. Count Daun's army formed the centre of this chain, poſſeſſing the heighths of Wahlſtadt and Hochkirk: general Laudohn covered the ground between Jeſchkendorf and Coſchitz: the riſing grounds of Parchwitz were ſecured by general Nauendorff; and M. de Beck, who formed the left, extended his troops beyond Coſſendau. The king marched in the night of the 11th, with a view to turn the enemy, and reach Jauer; but at break of day he diſcovered a new camp at Prauſnitz, which conſiſted of Lacy's detachment, juſt arrived from Lauban. The Pruſſians immediately paſſed the Katzbach, to attac this general, but he made ſuch a ſkilful diſpoſition for a retreat towards the army of count Daun, that he not only baffled the endeavours of the king to bring him to action, but, by poſting himſelf on the heighths of Henneſdorff, anticipated his march to Jauer. In vain the Pruſſian monarch attempted next day to turn the enemy on the ſide of the mountains, by Pomſen and Jagerſdorff; the roads were found impaſſable to the ammunition waggons, and the king returned to the camp at Lignitz.

While he remained in this ſituation he received advice that 24,000 Ruſſians, under count Czernichew, had thrown bridges over the Oder at Auras, where they intended to croſs that river, and he concluded the enemy had formed a deſign to cloſe him in, and attac him with their joint forces. Daun had, indeed, projected a plan for ſurpriſing him in over-awed by the army of count Daun; that prince Henry, far from being in a condition to bring relief, would not be able to ſtand his ground againſt the Ruſſians: that Breſlau being an open mercantile town, not a fortreſs, could not be defended without contravening the eſtabliſhed rules of war; and therefore the governor, in caſe of obſtinacy, had no reaſon to expect an honourable capitulation, the benefit of which was now offered. He, at the ſame time, ſent a memorial to the civil magiſtrates, threatening their town with deſtruction, which could by no other means be prevented than by joining with the inhabitants in perſuading the governor to embrace immediately the terms that were propoſed. Count Tavenzein, inſtead of being intimidated, was encouraged by theſe menaces, which implied an apprehenſion in Laudohn that the place would be relieved. He, therefore, replied to the ſummons he had received, that Breſlau was not ſimply a mercantile town, but ought to be conſidered as a place of ſtrength, as being ſurrounded with works and wet ditches; that the Auſtrians themſelves had defended it as ſuch after the battle of Liſſa, in the year 1757; that the king his maſter having commanded him to defend the place to the laſt extremity, he could neither comply with general Laudohn's propoſals, nor pay the leaſt regard to his threats of deſtroying the town, as he had not been entruſted with the care of the houſes, but with the defence of the fortifications. The Auſtrian convinced him that ſame evening, that he threatened nothing but what he meant to perform. He opened his batteries, and poured in upon the town a moſt terrible ſhower of bombs and red-hot bullets, which continued till midnight. During this dreadful diſcharge, which filled the place with horror and deſolation, he attempted the outworks by aſſault. The Croats attacked the covered way in different places with their uſual impetuoſity; but were repulſed with conſiderable loſs, by the conduct and reſolution of the governor and garriſon. Theſe proceedings having made no impreſſions on Tavenzein, the beſieging general had recourſe again to negotiation, and offered the moſt flattering articles of capitulation, which were rejected with diſdain. The governor gave him to underſtand, that the deſtruction of the town had made no change in his reſolution, though it was a practice contrary to the law of arms, as well as to the dictates of common humanity, to begin the ſiege of a fortreſs by ruining the inhabitants: finally, he aſſured him he would wait for him upon the ramparts, and defend the place to the utmoſt of his power. His obſervation was certainly juſt: nothing could be more infamouſly inhuman than this practice of making war upon the helpleſs unarmed inhabitanrs of a town which has the misfortune to be beleaguered: yet the beſieger pleaded the example of the Pruſſian monarch, who had before acted the ſame tragedy at Dreſden. Loudohn being thus ſet at defiance, continued to batter and bombard, and ſeveral ſubſequent aſſaults were given to the fortifications.

the night, and had actually put his army in motion for that purpoſe; but he was anticipated by the vigilance and good fortune of the Pruſſian monarch. That prince, reflecting that if he ſhould wait for his adverſaries in his camp he ran the riſk of being attacked at the ſame time by Lacy on his right, by Daun in his front, and by Laudohn on his left, he altered his poſition, in order to diſconcert their operations; and, on the 14th day of the month, marched to the heighths of Pfaffendorff, where he formed his army in order of battle. Receiving intimation, about two in the morning, that Laudohn was in full march, advancing in two columns by Bennowitz, he divided his army into two ſeparate bodies. One of theſe remained on the ground, in order to maintain the poſt againſt any attempts that might be made by count Daun to ſuccour Laudohn; and that this ſervice might be the more effectually performed, the heighths were fortified with batteries, ſo judiciouſly diſpoſed as to impede and overawe the whole Auſtrian army. The king, having taken this precaution, wheeled about with 16 battalions and 30 ſquadrons, to fall upon Laudohn as he ſhould advance; but that general knew nothing of his deſign, until he himſelf arrived at the village of Pfaffendorff, about three in the morning, when the day dawning, and a thic fog gradually diſperſing, the whole detachment of the Pruſſian army appeared in order of battle, in a well choſen ſituation, ſtrengthened with a numerous train of artillery, placed to the beſt advantage. Laudohn was not a little a mortified to find himſelf caught in his own ſnare; but he had advanced too far to recede, and, therefore, making a virtue of neceſſity, reſolved to ſtand an engagement. With this view he formed his troops as well as the time, place, and circumſtances would permit; and the Pruſſians advancing to the attac, a ſevere action enſued. The king rode along the line to animate the troops and ſuperintended every part of the charge, hazarding his life in the moſt dangerous ſcenes of the battle to ſuch a degree, that his horſe was killed under him, and his clothes were ſhot through in ſeveral places. The Auſtrians maintained the conflict with great obſtinacy until ſix in the morning, when they gave ground, and were purſued to the Katzbach, beyond which the king would not allow his troops to proſecute the advantage they had gained, that they might be able to ſuccour the right, in caſe mareſchal count Daun ſhould ſucceed in his attempt to advance againſt them from Lignitz. That general had actually begun his march to fall upon the Pruſſians on one ſide, while Laudohn ſhould attac them on the other; but he was not a little ſurpriſed to find they were decamped, and when he perceived a thic cloud of ſmoke at a diſtance, he immediately comprehended the nature of the king's management. He then attempted to advance by Lignitz; but the troops and artillery, which had been left on the height of Pfaffendorff, to diſpute his march, were ſo advantageouſly diſpoſed, as to render all his efforts abortive.

Laudohn is ſaid to have loſt in the action above 8000 men, killed, wounded, and taken, including 80 officers, with 23 pair of colours, and 82 pieces of cannon: over and above this loſs, the Auſtrian general ſuffered greatly by deſertion. The Pruſſians obtained the victory at the expence of one general, with 500 men killed, and 1200 wounded. Immediately after the action the victor marched to Parchwith; while Daun detached prince Lowenſtein and general Beck, with the reſerve of his army, to join prince Czernichew, who had croſſed the Oder at Auras; but he was ſo intimidated by the defeat at Lignitz, that he forthwith repaſſed that river, and prince Lowenſtein retited on the ſide of Jauer. By this bold and well-conducted adventure, the Pruſſian monarch not only eſcaped the moſt imminent hazard of a total defeat from the joint efforts of two ſtrong armies, but alſo prevented the dreaded junction of the Ruſſian and Auſtrian forces. His buſineſs was now to open the communication with Breſlau and his brother prince Henry, whom he joined at Neumarcke. The prince, after Laudohn was obliged to relinquiſh the ſiege of Breſlau, had kept a watchful eye over the motions of the Ruſſian army, which had advanced into the neighbourhood of that city, and, without all doubt, would have bombarded it from ſome commanding heighths, had they not been prevented by prince Henry, who took poſſeſſion of theſe poſts, and fortified them with redoubts. The king, having freed Breſlau from the neighbourhood of his enemies, and being ſtrengthened by the junction with his brother, left a conſiderable detachment under the command of general Boltze, to protect the country againſt the Ruſſian irregulars; and advanced with his whole force to the relief of Schweidnitz, which was blocked up by the Auſtrian forces under the command of the mareſchal count Daun. In his march he fell upon a ſeparate body under general Beck, made two battalions of Croats priſoners, and diſperſed ſeveral ſquadrons. This achievement had ſuch an effect upon the enemy, that they raiſed the blockade, and retreated with ſome precipitation to the mountains of Landſhut.

While the king thus exerted himſelf, with a ſpirit altogether unexampled, in defending Sileſia, general Hulſen, who commanded his troops in Saxony, was expoſed to the moſt imminent danger. Underſtanding that the army of the Empire had formed a deſign to cut off his communication with Torgau, he quitted his camp at Meiſſen, and marched to Strehla. The enemy having divided their forces into two bodies, one of them, on the 20th day of Auguſt, attacked an advanced poſt of the Pruſſians; while the other was diſpoſed in ſuch a manner, as to over-awe Hulſen's camp, and prevent him from taking any ſtep for the relief of his battalions, who maintained their ground with difficulty againſt a ſuperior number of the aſſailants. In this emergency the Pruſſian general ordered his cavalry to make a circuit round a riſing ground, and, if poſſible, charge the enemy in flank. This order was executed with equal vigour and ſucceſs. They fell upon the Imperial army with ſuch impetuoſity, as drove their battalions and horſe upon each other in the utmoſt confuſion. A conſiderable number of the enemy were ſlain, and 41 officers, with 1200 men, made priſoners. By this advantage, which was obtained at a very ſmall expence, general Hulſen opened for himſelf a way to Torgau, whither he inſtantly retreated, perceiving that the whole army of the Imperialiſts was advancing to cut off his communication with the Elbe. This retreat furniſhed the enemy with a pretext for claiming the victory.

After all theſe heroic endeavours of the Pruſſian monarch and his officers, his affairs remained in ſuch a deſperate ſituation as ſeemed to preſage approaching ruin: for, though in perſon, he commanded a numerous and well appointed army, he found it abſolutely impoſſible to guard againſt the different detachments from the three ſeparate armies of his adverſaries. Bodies of Auſtrian troops ſcoured the country of Luſatia; the Ruſſians traverſed part of Sileſia, and made irruptions even into Brandenburgh: the Imperial army domineered in Saxony: the Swediſh army, meeting with no oppoſition, advanced into the heart of Pomerania; ſo that the king was not only threatened on every ſide, but all correſpondence between him and his hereditary dominions was at this juncture intercepted.

His adverſaries, having been hitherto baffled by his activity and reſolution in their deſigns upon Sileſia, now meditated a ſcheme, the execution of which he could not but feel in the moſt ſenſible manner. The Ruſſian army being on its retreat from Sileſia, count Czernichew was ſent with a ſtrong detachment into the Marché of Brandenburgh; while a numerous body of Auſtrians, under Lacy and Bretano, penetrated into the ſame country from Saxony, with inſtructions to join the Ruſſians at the gates of Berlin. The Pruſſian general, Hulſen, finding himſelf too weak to cope with the army of the Empire in Miſnia, had fallen bac to this capital, where he was joined by the troops under general Werner, lately returned from Pomerania; but as their forces, after this junction, did not exceed ſixteen thouſand men, and the allies advancing againſt them amounted to forty thouſand, they would not pretend to oppoſe the enemy in the open field, nor to defend a city of ſuch extent, and ſo imperfectly fortified. Such an attempt would have only expoſed their troops to ruin, without being able to ſave the capital, which, on the contrary, would have been the more ſeverely handled, in conſequence of their oppoſition. They, therefore, reſolved to retire, after having repulſed the advanced guard of the Ruſſians under Tottleben, which attacked the gates, and even bombarded the town, before the great armies appeared. At their approach the Pruſſian generals retreated, leaving three weak battalions in the place, in hopes they might be the means of obtaining ſome ſort of terms for the city. They made no reſiſtance, however, but on the firſt ſummons propoſed articles of capitulation, which, being refuſed, they ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war. In favour of the city the foreign miniſters there reſiding, interpoſed their mediation with ſuch zeal and ſucceſs, that tolerable conditions were obtained. The inhabitants were indulged with the free exerciſe of their religion, and an immunity from violence to their perſons and effects. The enemy promiſed that the Ruſſian irregulars ſhould not enter the town; and that the king's palace ſhould not be violated. Theſe articles being ratified, the Auſtrian and Ruſſian troops entered the place, where they totally deſtroyed the magazines, arſenals, and founderies, with an immenſe quantity of military ſtores, and a great number of cannon and ſmall arms: then they demanded the immediate payment of eight hundred thouſand guilders; and afterwards exacted a contribution of one million nine hundred thouſand German crowns. Many outrages were committed by the licentious ſoldiery, in ſpite of all the precautions which the officers could take to preſerve the moſt exact diſcipline. The houſes of the private inhabitants were tolerably protected, but the king's palaces were ſubjected to the moſt rigorous treatment. In the royal palace of Charlottenburg they pillaged and ſpoiled the rich furniture; they defaced and mutilated the valuable pictures and antique ſtatues collected by cardinal de Polignac, and purchaſed by the houſe of Brandenburgh. The caſtle of Schonhauſen, belonging to the queen, and that of Fredericksfeldt, the property of the Margrave Charles, were pillaged of effects to a very conſiderable value. The palace of Potſdam was effectually protected by prince Eſterhaſi, who would not ſuffer one article of furniture or ornament to be touched, but deſired leave to take one picture of the king, and two of his german-flutes, that he might preſerve them as memorials of an illuſtrious prince, whoſe heroic character he admired. The Auſtrian and Ruſſian troops entered Berlin on the 9th day of October, and quitted it on the 13th, on hearing that the king was in full march to the relief of his capital. In their retreat, by different routs, from Brandenburgh, they drove away all the cattle and horſes they could find, ravaged the country, and committed brutal outrages on the inhabitants, which the pretence of retaliation could never excuſe. The body of Ruſſians which entered Berlin marched from thence into Poland, by the way of Furſtenwalde, while the Auſtrians took the rout of Saxony, from whence they had advanced into Brandenburgh. Mean while the town of Wirtemberg, in that electorate, was reduced by the duke de Deux Ponts, commander of the Imperial army, which, in conjunction with the Auſtrians, made themſelves maſters alſo of Torgau and Leipſick.

The king of Pruſſia, in his march through Luſatia, was ſtill attended by count Daun, at the head of the grand army, and both paſſed the Elbe about the latter end of October. The Pruſſian croſſed the river at Coſwick, where he was joined by the troops under prince Eugene of Wirtemberg and general Hulſen, ſo that his army now amounted to 80,000 fighting men, with whom he reſolved to ſtrike ſome ſtroke of importance. Indeed, at this time his ſituation was truly critical. General Laudohn, with a conſiderable body of Auſtrians, remained in Sileſia; the Ruſſian army ſtill threatened Breſlau, the capital of that country. The Imperialiſts and Auſtrians had taken poſſeſſion of all the great towns in Saxony, and were maſters on both ſides of the Elbe. In the eaſtern part of Pomerania the Ruſſians had inveſted Colberg by ſea and land, ſeemingly determined to reduce the place, that they might have a ſea-port, by which they could be ſupplied with proviſion, ammunition, neceſſaries, and re-enforcements, without the trouble and inconvenience of a long and laborious march from the banks of the Viſtula. On the weſtern ſide of Pomerania, the war, which had hitherto languiſhed, was renewed by the Swedes with uncommon vivacity. They paſſed the river Pene without oppoſition; and obliging general Stutterheim to retreat, advanced as far as Stranſberg. That officer, however, being re-enforced, attacked a Swediſh poſt at Paſſelvalik, ſlew about 500 of the enemy, and took an equal number, with ſix pieces of cannon; but he was not numerous enough to keep the field againſt their whole army. Thus the Pruſſian monarch ſaw himſelf obliged to abandon Sileſia, deprived of all the places he held in Saxony, which had been his beſt reſource, and in danger of being driven into his hereditary country of Brandenburgh, which was unable either to maintain, or even to recruit his army. On this emergency he reſolved to make one deſperate effort againſt the grand Auſtrian army, under count Daun, who had paſſed the Elbe at Torgau, and advanced to Eulenbourg, from whence, however, he retreated to his former camp at Torgau, and the king choſe his ſituation between this laſt place and Schilda, at Lang-Reichenbach, where his huſſars attacked a body of horſe under general Brentano, and made 400 priſoners. The right wing of the Auſtrians being at Groſwich, and the left at Torgau, the Pruſſian king determined to attac them next day, which was the 3d of November. His deſign was to march through the wood of Torgau by three different routes, with 30 battalions and 50 ſquadrons of his left wing: the firſt line ordered to advance by the way of Mackrene to Neiden; the ſecond, by Peckhutte to Elſnick; and the third, conſiſting of cavalry, to penetrate by the wood of Wildenhayn to Vogellang. On the other hand, general Ziethen was directed to take the great Leipſick road, with 30 battalions and 70 ſquadrons of the right; and quitting it at the ponds of Torgau, to attac the villages of Suptitz and Groſwich. The king's line, in its march, fell in with a corps of Auſtrians under general Reid, who retired into the wood of Torgau; and another more conſiderable body, poſted in the wood of Wildenhayn, likewiſe retreated to Groſchutz, after having fired ſome pieces of artillery: but the dragoons of Sr. Ignon, being encloſed between two columns of Pruſſian infantry, were either killed or taken. By two in the afternoon the king had penetrated through the wood to the plain of Neiden, from whence another body of the enemy retired to Torgau, where a continued noiſe of cannon and ſmall arms declared that general Ziethen was already engaged. The Pruſſians immediately advanced at a quicker pace, and paſſing the moraſſes near Nieden, inclined to the right in three lines, and ſoon came to action. Daun had choſen a very advantageous poſition: his right extended to Groſwich, and his left to Zinne; while his infantry occupied ſome eminences along the road of Leipſick, and his front was ſtrengthened with no leſs than two hundred pieces of cannon. His ſecond line was diſpoſed on an extent of ground, which terminated in hillocks towards the Elbe; and againſt this the king directed his attac. He had already given his troops to underſtand, that his affairs were in ſuch a ſituation, they muſt either conquer or periſh: and they began the battle with the moſt deſperate impetuoſity; but they met with ſuch a warm reception from the artillery, ſmall arms, and in particular from the Auſtrian carabiniers, that their grenadiers were ſhattered and repulſed. The ſecond charge, though enforced with incredible vigour, was equally unſucceſsful: then the king ordered his cavalry to advance, and they fell upon ſome regiments of infantry with ſuch fury as obliged them to give way. Theſe, however, were compelled to retire, in their turn, before about 70 battalions of the enemy, who advanced towards Torgau, ſtretching with their right to the Elbe, and their left to Zinne. While the prince of Holſtein rallied his cavalry, and returned to the charge, the third line of Pruſſian infantry attacked the vineyard of Suptitz, and general Ziethen, with the right wing took the enemy in rear. This diſpoſition threw the Auſtrians into diſorder, which was greatly augmented by the diſaſter of count Daun, who was dangerouſly wounded in the thigh, and carried off the field of battle. But the Pruſſians could not purſue their victory, becauſe the action had laſted until nine; and the night being unuſually dark, facilitated the retreat of the enemy, who croſſed the Elbe on three bridges of boats, thrown over the river at Torgau. The victor poſſeſſed the field of battle, with 7000 priſoners, including 200 officers, 29 pair of colours, one ſtandard, and about 40 pieces of cannon. The carnage was very great on both ſides: about 3000 Pruſſians were killed, and 5000 wounded; and, in the firſt attacks, two general officers, with 1500 ſoldiers, were made priſoners by the enemy. The king, as uſual, expoſed his perſon in every part of the battle, and a muſket-ball grazed upon his breaſt. In the morning the king of Pruſſia entered Torgau: then he ſecured Meiſſen, and took poſſeſſion of Freyberg; ſo that, in conſequence of this well-timed victory, his poſition was nearly the ſame as at the opening of the campaign.

The Auſtrians, however, notwithſtanding this check, maintained their ground in the neighbourhood of Dreſden; while the Pruſſians were diſtributed in quarters of cantonment in and about Leipſick and Meiſſen. As the Auſtrian general had, after the battle, recalled his detachments, general Laudohn abandoned Lanſhut, which again fell into the hands of the Pruſſians, and the imperial army was obliged to retire into Franconia. The Swedes having penetrated a great way into Pomerania, returned again to their winter-quarters at Stralſund: and the Ruſſian generals meaſured bac their way to the Viſtula: ſo that the confederates gained little eaſe in the courſe of this campaign but the contributions which they raiſed in Berlin, and the open country of Brandenburgh. Had all the allies been heartily bent upon cruſhing the Pruſſian monarch, one would imagine the Ruſſians and Swedes might have joined their forces in Pomerania, and made good their winter-quarters in Brandenburgh, where they could have been ſupplied with magazines from the Baltick, and been at hand to commence their operations in the ſpring: but in all probability, ſuch an eſtabliſhment in the empire would have given umbrage to the Germanick body.

The diet of Poland being aſſembled in the beginning of October, the king entertained the moſt ſanguine hope they would take ſome reſolution in his favour; but the partiſans of Pruſſia fruſtrated all his endeavours: one of the deputies proteſting againſt holding a diet while there were foreign troops in the kingdom, the aſſembly broke up in a tumultuous manner, even before they had choſen a mareſchal. The diet of Sweden, which was convoked about the ſame period, ſeemed determined to proceed upon buſineſs. They elected count Axel Ferſon their grand mareſchal, in oppoſition to count Horn, by a great majority; which was an unlucky circumſtance for the Pruſſian intereſt at Stockholm, inaſmuch as the ſame majority obſtinately perſiſted in opinion, that the war ſhould be proſecuted in the ſpring with redoubled vigour, and the army in Germany re-enforced to the number of at leaſt 30,000 fighting men. This unfavourable circumſtance made but little impreſſion upon the Pruſſian monarch, who had maintained his ground with ſurpriſing reſolution and ſucceſs ſince the beginning of the campaign, and now enjoyed in proſpect the benefit of winter, which he is ſaid to have termed his beſt auxiliary.

The animoſity which inflamed the contending parties was not confined to the operations in war: but broke out, as uſual, in printed declarations, which the belligerent powers diffuſed all over Europe. In the beginning of the ſeaſon the ſtates of the circle of Weſtphalia had been required by the imperial court, to furniſh their contingent of troops againſt the king of Pruſſia, or to commute for this contingent with a ſum of money. In conſequence of this demand, ſome of the Weſtphalian eſtates had ſent deputies to confer with the aſſembly of the circle of Cologn; and to theſe the king ſignified, by a declaration, dated at Munſter, that as this demand of money, inſtead of troops, was no leſs extraordinary than contrary to the conſtitutions of the empire, ſhould they comply with it, or even continue to aſſiſt his enemies either with troops or money, he would conſider them as having actually taken part in the war againſt him and his allies, and treat them accordingly on all occaſions. This intimation produced little effect in his favour. The duke of Mecklenbourg adhered to the oppoſite cauſe; and the elector of Cologn co-operated with the French in their deſigns againſt Hanover. By way of retaliation for this partiality, the Pruſſians ravaged the country of Mecklenbourg, and the Hanoverians levied contributions in the territories of Cologn. The parties thus aggrieved had recourſe to complaints and remonſtrances. The duke's envoy at Ratiſbon communicated a reſcript to the imperial miniſters, repreſenting, that the Pruſſian troops under general Werner and colonel de Belling had diſtreſſed his country in the autumn by grievous extortions; that afterwards prince Eugene of Wertemberg, in the ſervice of Pruſſia, had demanded an exorbitant quantity of proviſions, with ſome millions of money, and a great number of recruits: or, in lieu of theſe, that the duke's forces ſhould act under the Pruſſian banner. He therefore declared, that as the country of Mecklenbourg was impoveriſhed, and almoſt depopulated by theſe oppreſſions, the duke would find himſelf obliged to take meaſures for the future ſecurity of his ſubjects, if not immediately favoured with ſuch aſſiſtance from the court of Vienna as would put a ſtop to theſe violent proceedings. This declaration was, by ſome conſidered as the prelude of his renouncing his engagements with the houſe of Auſtria. As the imperial court had threatened to put the elector of Hanover under the ban of the empire, in conſequence of the hoſtilities which his troops had committed in the electorate of Cologn, his reſident at Ratiſbon delivered to the miniſters who aſſiſted at the diet a memorial, remonſtrating that the emperor had no power, ſingly, to ſubject any prince to the ban, or declare him a rebel; and that, by arrogating ſuch a power, he expoſed his authority to the ſame contempt into which the pope's bulls of excommunication were ſo juſtly fallen. With reſpect to the elector of Cologn, he obſerved, that this prince was the firſt who commenced hoſtilities, by allowing his troops to co-operate with the French in their invaſion of Hanover, and by celebrating with rejoicings the advantages which they had gained in that electorate: he, therefore, gave the eſtates of the empire to underſtand, that the beſt way of ſcreening their ſubjects from hoſtile treatment would be a ſtrict obſervance of neutrality in the preſent diſputes of the empire.

This was a ſtrain much more effectual among princes and powers who are generally actuated by intereſted motives, than was the repetition of complaints, equally pathetic and unavailing, uttered by the unfortunate king of Poland, elector of Saxony. The damage done to his capital by the laſt attempt of the Pruſſian monarch on that city affected the old king in ſuch a manner, that he publiſhed at Vienna an appeal to all the powers of Europe, from the cruelty and unprecedented outrages which diſtinguiſhed the conduct of his adverſaries in Saxony. All Europe pitied the hard fate of this exiled prince, and ſympathiſed with the diſaſters of his country: but in the breaſt of his enemies, reaſons of ſtate and convenience over-ruled the ſuggeſtions of humanity; and his friends had hitherto exerted themſelves in vain for the deliverance of his people.

From this detail of continental affairs, our attention is recalled to Great-Britain, by an incident of a very intereſting nature; an account of which, however, we ſhall poſtpone until we have recorded the ſucceſs that in the courſe of this year, attended the Britiſh arms in the Eaſt-Indies. We have already obſerved, that colonel Coote, after having defeated the French general Lally in the field, and reduced divers of the enemy's ſettlements on the coaſt of Caromandel, at length cooped them up within the walls of Pondicherry, the principal ſeat of the French Eaſt-India company, large, populace, well fortified and ſecured with a numerous garriſon, under the immediate command of their general. In the month of October admiral Stevens ſailed from Trincomalé with all his ſquadron, in order to its being refitted, except five ſail of the line, which he left under the command of captain Haldane, to bloc up Pondicherry by ſea, while mr. Coote carried on his operations by land. By this diſpoſition, and the vigilance of the Britiſh officers, the place was ſo hampered, as to be greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, even before the ſiege could be undertaken in form; for the rainy ſeaſon rendered all regular approaches impracticable. Theſe rains being abated by the 26th day of November, colonel Coote directed the engineers to pitch upon proper places for erecting batteries that ſhould enfilade or flank the works of the garriſon, without expoſing their own men to any ſevere fire from the enemy. Accordingly, four batteries were conſtructed in different places, ſo as to anſwer theſe purpoſes, and opened altogether on the 8th day of December, at midnight. Though raiſed at a conſiderable diſtance, they were plied with good effect, and the beſieged returned the fire with great vivacity. This mutual cannonading continued until the 29th day of the month, when the engineers were employed in raiſing another battery, near enough to effect a breach in the north-weſt counter-guard and curtain. Though the approaches were retarded ſome days by a violent ſtorm, which almoſt ruined the works, the damage was ſoon repaired: a conſiderable poſt was taking from the enemy by aſſault, and afterwards regained by the French grenadiers, through the timidity of the ſepoys by whom it was occupied. By the 15th day of January, a ſecond battery being raiſed within point-blank, a breach was made in the curtain: the weſt face and flank of the north-weſt baſtion were ruined, and the guns of the enemy entirely ſilenced. The garriſon and inhabitants of Pondicherry were now reduced to an extremity of famine which would admit of no heſitation. General Lally ſent a colonel, attended by the chief of the jeſuits, and two civilians, to mr. Coote, with propoſals of ſurrendering the garriſon priſoners of war, and demanding a capitulation in behalf of the French Eaſt-India company. On this ſubject he made no reply; but next morning took poſſeſſion of the town and citadel, where he found a great quantity of artillery, ammunition, ſmall arms, and military ſtores; then he ſecured the garriſon, amounting to above 2000 Europeans. Lally made a gallant defence, and, had he been properly ſupplied with proviſion, the conqueſt of the place would not have been ſo eaſily achieved. He certainly flattered himſelf with the hope of being ſupplied; otherwiſe an officer of his experience would have demanded a capitulation before he was reduced to the neceſſity of acquieſcing in any terms the beſieger might have thought proper to impoſe. That he ſpared no pains to procure ſupplies appears from an intercepted letter[r] written by his commander to monſieur Raymond, French re-ſident at Pullicat.—The billet is no bad ſketch of the writer's character, which ſeems to have a ſtrong tincture of oddity and extravagance.

[r] 'Monſieur Raymond—the Engliſh ſquadron is no more, ſir—of the 12 ſhips they had in our road, ſeven are loſt, crews and all; the other four diſmaſted; and no more than one frigate hath eſcaped—therefore, loſe not an inſtant in ſending chelingoes upon chelingoes, laden with rice—The Dutch have nothing to fear now. Beſides, according to the law of nations, they are only reſtricted from ſending us proviſions in their own bottoms; and we are no longer blockaded by ſea.—The ſalvation of Pondicherry hath been once in your power already: if you neglect this opportunity, it will be entirely

By the reduction of Pondicherry the French intereſt was annihilated on the coaſt ef Coromandel, and therefore of the utmoſt importance to the Britiſh nation. It may be doubted, however, whether colonel Coote, with all his ſpirit, vigilance, and militray talents, could have ſucceeded in this enterprize without the aſſiſtance of the ſquadron, which co-operated with him by ſea, and effectually excluded all ſuccour from the beſieged. It muſt be owned, for the honour of the ſervice, that no incident interrupted the good underſtanding which was maintained between the land and ſea officers, who vied with each other in contributing their utmoſt efforts towards the ſucceſs of the expedition. On the 25th day of December rear-admiral Stevens arrived with four ſhips of the line, having parted with rear-admiral Corniſh and his diviſion in ſtormy weather: but he joined them at Pondicherry before the place was ſurrendered. On the firſt day of January a violent tempeſt obliged admiral Stevens to ſlip his cables and put to ſea, where he parted with the reſt of his ſquadron; and when in 3 days he returned to the road of Pondicherry, he had the mortification to find that his diviſion had ſuffered ſeverely from the ſtorm. The ſhips of war called the Duke of Aquitaine and the Sunderland foundered in the ſtorm, and their crews periſhed. The Newcaſtle, the Queenborough, and the Protector fireſhip, were driven aſhore, and deſtroyed; but the men were ſaved, together with the cannon, ſtores, and proviſions. Many other ſhips ſuſtained conſiderable damage, which, however, was ſoon repaired. Admiral Stevens having intercepted the letter from Lally to Raymond inſerted (in p. 489) immediately diſpached letters to the Dutch and Daniſh ſettlements on this coaſt, intimating, that, notwithſtanding the inſinuations of general Lally, he had 11 ſail of the line, with two frigates, under his command, all fit for ſervice, in the road of Pondicherry, which was cloſely inveſted and blockaded both by ſea and land: he, therefore, declared, that as in that caſe it was contrary to the law of nations for any neutral power to relieve or ſuccour the beſieged, he was determined to ſeiſe any veſſel that ſhould attempt to throw proviſions into the place.

While the arms of Great-Britain ſtill proſpered in every effort tending to the real intereſt of the nation, an event happended, which, for a moment, obſcured the ſplendor of her triumphs; and could not but be very alarming to thoſe German allies, whom her liberality had enabled to maintain an expenſive and ſanguinary war of humour and ambition. On the 25th day of October, George II. king of Great-Britain, without any previous diſorder, was, in the morning, ſuddenly ſeiſed with the agony of death, at the palace at Kenſington. He had riſen at his uſual hour, drunk his chocolate, and enquired about the wind, as anxious for the arrival of the foreign mails; then he opened a window of his apartment, and perceiving the weather was ſerene, declared he would walk in the garden. In a few minutes after this declaration, while he remained alone in his chamber, he fell down upon the floor; the noiſe of his fall brought his attendants into the room, who lifted him on the bed, where he deſired, in a faint voice, that the princeſs Amelia might be called; but before ſhe could reach the apartment he had expired. An attempt was made to bleed him, but without effect; and indeed his malady was far beyond the reach of art: for when the cavity of the thorax or cheſt was opened, and inſpected by the ſerjeant-ſurgeons, they found the right ventricle of the heart actually ruptured, and a great quantity of blood diſcharged through the aperture into the ſurrounding pericardium; ſo that he muſt have died inſtantaneouſly, in conſequence of the effuſion. The caſe, however, was ſo extraordinary, that we queſtion whether there is ſuch another inſtance upon record.—A rupture of this nature appears the more remarkable, as it happened to a prince of a healthy conſtitution, unaccuſtomed to exceſs, and far advanced beyond that period of life, when the blood might be ſuppoſed to flow with a dangerous impetuoſity.

Thus died George II. at the age of 77, after a long reign of 34 years, diſtinguiſhed by a variety of important events, and chequered with a viciſſitude of character and fortune. He was in his perſon rather lower than the middle ſize, well ſhaped, erect, with eyes remarkably prominent, a high noſe, and fair complexion. In his diſpoſition he is ſaid to have been haſty, prone to anger, eſpecially in his youth, yet ſoon appeaſed; otherwiſe mild, moderate, and humane: in his way of living temperate, regular, and ſo methodical in every branch of private œconomy, that his attention deſcended to objects which a great king (perhaps) had better overlook. He was fond of military pomp and parade; and perſonally brave. He loved war as a ſoldier; he ſtudied it as a ſcience; and correſponded on this ſubject with ſome of the greateſt officers whom Germany has produced. The extent of his underſtanding, and the ſplendor of his virtue, we ſhall not preſume to aſcertain, or attempt to diſplay; we rather wiſh for opportunities to expatiate on his munificence and liberality; his generous regard to genius and learning; his royal encouragement and protection of thoſe arts by which a nation is at once beneſited and adorned. With reſpect to his government, it very ſeldom deviated from the inſtitutions of law; or encroached upon private property; or interferred with the common adminiſtration of juſtice. The circumſtances that chiefly marked his public character, were a predilection for his native country, and a cloſe attention to the political intereſts of the Germanick body: points and principles to which he adhered with the moſt invincible fortitude; and if ever the blood and treaſure of Great-Britain were ſacrificed to theſe conſiderations, we ought not ſo much to blame the prince, who acted from the dictates of natural affection, as we ſhould deteſt a ſucceſſion of venal miniſters, all of whom in their turns devoted themſelves, ſoul and body, to the gratification of his paſſion, or partiality, ſo prejudicial to the true intereſt of their country.

The reign of George II. produced many revolutions, as well in the internal ſchemes of œconomy and adminiſtration, as in the external projects of political connexions; revolutions that expoſed the frailties of human nature, and demonſtrated the inſtability of ſyſtems founded upon convenience. In the courſe of this reign a ſtanding army was, by dint of miniſterial influence, engraſted on the conſtitution of Great-Britain. A fatal ſtroke was given to the liberty of the preſs, by the act ſubjecting all dramatic writings to the inſpection of a licenſer. The great machine of corruption, contrived to ſecure a conſtant majority in parliament, was overturned, and the inventor of it obliged to quit the reins of government. Profeſſed patriots reſigned the principles they had long endeavoured to eſtabliſh, and liſted themſelves for the defence of that fortreſs againſt which their zeal and talents had been levelled. The management of a mighty kingdom was conſigned into the hands of a motley adminiſtration, miniſters without knowledge, and men without integrity, whoſe councils were timid, weak, and wavering; whoſe folly and extravagance expoſed the nation to ridicule and contempt; by whoſe ignorance and preſumption it was reduced to the verge of ruin. The kingdom was engaged in a quarrel truely national, and commenced a neceſſary war on national principles; but that war was ſtarved, and the chief ſtrength of the nation transferred to the continent of Europe, in order to maintain an unneceſſary war, in favour of a family whoſe pride and ambition can be equalled by nothing but its inſolence and ingratitude. While the ſtrength of the nation was thus exerted abroad for the ſupport of worthleſs allies, and a dangerous rebellion raged in the bowels of the kingdom, the ſovereign was inſulted by his miniſters, who deſerted his ſervice at that critical juncture, and refuſed to reſume their functions, until he had truckled to their petulant humour, and diſmiſſed a favourite ſervant, of whoſe ſuperior talents they were meanly jealous. Such an unprecedent ſeceſſion at any time would have merited the imputation of inſolence; but at that period, when their ſovereign was perplexed and embarraſſed by a variety of dangers and difficulties; when his crown, and even his life, was at ſtake, to throw up their places, abandon his councils, and, as far as in them lay, detach themſelves from his fortune, was a ſtep ſo likely to aggravate the diſorder of the nation, ſo big with cruelty, ingratitude, and ſedition, that it ſeems to deſerve an appellation which, however, we do not think proper to beſtow. An inglorious war was ſucceeded by an ignominious peace, which proved of ſhort duration; yet in this interval the Engliſh nation exhibited ſuch a proof of commercial opulence, as aſtoniſhed all Europe. At the cloſe of a war which had drained it of ſo much treaſure, and increaſed the public debt to an enormous burthen, it acquieſced under ſuch a reduction of intereſt as one would hardly think the miniſtry durſt have propoſed, even before one half of the national debt was con-your own fault—don't forget ſome ſmall chelingoes alſo—offer great re- . . . in four days I expect 17,000 Mahrattas.—In ſhort, riſque all—attempt all,—force all, and ſend us ſome rice, ſhould it be but half a garſe at a time.

tracted. A much more unpopular ſtep was a law that paſſed for naturalizing the Jews—a law ſo odious to the people in general, that it was ſoon repealed, at the requeſt of that miniſter by whom it had been chiefly patroniſed. An ill-concerted peace was in a little time productive of freſh hoſtilities, and another war with France, which Britain began to proſecute under unfavourable auſpices. Then the whole political ſyſtem of Germany was inverted. The king of England abandoned the intereſt of that houſe which he had in the former war ſo warmly eſpouſed, and took into his boſom a prince whom he had formerly conſidered as his inveterate enemy. The unpropitious beginning of this war againſt France being imputed to the miſconduct of the adminiſtration, excited ſuch a ferment among the people, as ſeemed to threaten a dangerous inſurrection. Every part of the kingdom reſounded with the voice of diſſatisfaction, which did not even reſpect the throne. The king found himſelf obliged to accept of a miniſter preſented by the people, and this meaſure was attended with conſequences as favourable as his wiſh could form. From that inſtant all clamour was huſhed; all oppoſition ceaſed. The enterprizing ſpirit of the new miniſter ſeemed to diffuſe itſelf through all the operations of the war; and conqueſt every where attended the efforts of the Britiſh arms. Now appeared the fallacy of thoſe maxims, and the falſehood of thoſe aſſertions, by which former miniſters had eſtabliſhed and endeavoured to excuſe the practices of corruption. The ſuppoſed diſaffection, which had been inſiſted on as the ſource of parliamentary oppoſition, now entirely vaniſhed; nor was it found neceſſary to uſe ſiniſter means for ſecuring a majority, in order to anſwer the purpoſes of the adminiſtration. England, for the firſt time, ſaw a miniſter of ſtate in full poſſeſſion of popularity. Under the auſpices of this miniſter, it ſaw a national militia formed, and trained to diſcipline by the invincible ſpirit of a few patriots, who purſued this ſalutary meaſure in the face of unwearied oppoſition, diſcouraged by the jealouſy of a court, and ridiculed by all the venal retainers to a ſtanding army. Under his miniſtry it ſaw the military genius of Great-Britain revive, and ſhine with redoubled luſtre; it ſaw her intereſt and glory co-incide, and an immence extent of country added by conqueſt to her dominions. The people, confiding in the integrity and abilities of their own miniſter, and elevated by the repeated ſounds of triumph, became enamoured of the war, and granted ſuch liberal ſubſidies for its ſupport, as no other miniſter would have preſumed to aſk, as no other nation believed they could afford. Nor did they murmur at ſeeing great part of their treaſure diverted into foreign channels; nor did they ſeem to beſtow a ſerious thought on the accumulating load of the national debt, which already exceeded the immenſe ſum of one hundred millions.

In a word, they were intoxicated with victory; and as the king happened to die in the midſt of their tranſports occaſioned by the final conqueſt of Canada, their good humour garniſhed his character with a prodigality of encomiums. A thouſand pens were drawn to paint the beauties and ſublimity of his character, in poetry as well as proſe. They extolled him above Alexander in courage and heroiſm, above Auguſtus in liberality, Titus in clemency, Antoninus in piety and benevolence, Solomon in wiſdom, and St. Edward in devotion. Such hyperbolical eulogiums ſerved only to throw a ridicule upon a character, which was otherwiſe reſpectable. The two univerſities vied with each other in lamenting his death, and each publiſhed a huge collection of elegies on the ſubject: nor did they fail to exalt his praiſe, with the warmeſt expreſſions of affection and regret, in the compliments of condolance and congratulation which they preſented to his ſucceſſor. The ſame panegyric and pathos appeared in all the addreſſes with which every other community in the kingdom approached the throne of our preſent ſovereign; inſomuch, that we may venture to ſay, no prince was ever more popular at the time of his deceaſe. The Engliſh are naturally warm and impetuous; and, in generous natures, affection is as apt as any other paſſion to run riot. The ſudden death of the king was lamented as a national misfortune by many, who felt a truely filial affection for their country; not that they implicitly ſubſcribed to all the exaggerated praiſe which had been ſo liberally poured forth on his character; but becauſe the nation was deprived of him at a critical juncture, while involved in a dangerous and expenſive war, of which he had been perſonally the chief mover and ſupport. They knew the burthen of royalty devolved upon a young prince, who, though heir apparent to the crown, and already arrived at years of maturity, had never been admitted to any ſhare of the adminiſtration, nor made acquainted with any ſchemes or ſecrets of ſtate. The real character of the new king was very little known to the generality of the nation. They dreaded an abrupt change of meaſures, which might have rendered uſeleſs all the advantages obtained in the courſe of the war. As they were ignorant of his connexions, they dreaded a revolution in the miniſtry, which might fill the kingdom with clamour and confuſion. But the greateſt ſhoc occaſioned by his deceaſe was undoubtedly among our allies and fellow-ſubjects in Germany, who ſaw themſelves ſuddenly deprived of their ſole prop and patron, at a time when they could not pretend, of themſelves, to make head againſt the numerous enemies by whom they were ſurrounded. But all theſe doubts and apprehenſions vaniſhed like miſts before the riſing ſun; and the people of Great-Britain enjoyed the inexpreſſible pleaſure of ſeeing their loſs repaired in ſuch a manner as muſt have amply fulfilled the moſt ſanguine wiſh of every friend to his country.

The commerce of Great-Britain continued to increaſe during the whole courſe of this reign; but this increaſe was not the effect of extraordinary encouragement. On the contrary, the neceſſities of government, the growing expences of the nation, and the continual augmentation of the public debt, obliged the legiſlature to hamper trade with manifold and grievous impoſitions: its increaſe, therefore, muſt have been owing to the natural progreſs of induſtry and adventure extending themſelves to that farthest line or limit beyond which they will not be able to advance: when the tide of traffic has flowed to its higheſt mark, it will then begin to recede in a gradual ebb, until it is ſhrunk within the narrow limits of its original channel. War, which naturally impedes the traffic of other nations, had opened new ſources to the merchants of Great-Britain: the ſuperiority of her naval power had cruſhed the navigation of France, her great rival in commerce, ſo that ſhe now ſupplied, on her own terms, all thoſe foreign markets, at which, in time of peace, ſhe was underſold by that dangerous competitor. Thus her trade was augmented to a ſurpriſing pitch; and this great augmentation alone enabled her to maintain the war at ſuch an enormous expence. As this advantage will ceaſe when the French are at liberty to re-eſtabliſh their commerce, and proſecute it without moleſtation, it would be for the intereſt of Great-Britain to be at continual variance with that reſtleſs neighbour provided the conteſt could be limited to the operations of a ſea-war, in which England would be always invincible and victorious.

The powers of the human mind were freely and fully exerciſed in this reign. Conſiderable progreſs was made in mathematics and aſtronomy by divers individuals; among whom we number Sanderſon, Bradley, Maclaurin, Smith, and the two Simpſons. Natural philoſophy became a general ſtudy, and the new doctrine of electricity grew into faſhion. Different methods were diſcovered for rendering ſea-water potable and ſweet; and divers uſeful hints were communicated to the public by the learned doctor Stephen Hales, who directed all his reſearches and experiments to the benefit of ſociety. The ſtudy of alchemy no longer prevailed; but the art of chemiſtry was perfectly underſtood, and aſſiduouſly applied to the purpoſes of ſophiſtication. The clergy of Great-Britain were generally learned, pious, and exemplary. Sherlock, Hoadley, Secker, and Conybeare were promoted to the firſt dignities of the church. Warburton, who had long ſignalized himſelf by the ſtrength and boldneſs of his genius, his extenſive capacity, and profound erudition, at length obtained the mitre. But theſe promotions were granted to reaſons of ſtate convenience, and perſonal intereſt, rathar than as rewards of extraordinary merit. Many other eccleſiaſtics of worth and learning were totally overlooked. Nor was eccleſiaſtical merit confined to the eſtabliſhed church. Many inſtances of extraordinary genius, unaffected piety, and univerſal moderation, appeared among the diſſenting miniſters of Great-Britain and Ireland: among theſe we particularize the elegant, the primitive Foſter; the learned, ingenious, and penetrating Leland.

The progreſs of reaſon, and free cultivation of the human mind, had not, however, entirely baniſhed thoſe ridiculous ſects and ſchiſms of which the kingdom had been formerly ſo productive. Impoſture and fanaticiſm ſtill hung upon the ſkirts of religion. Weak minds were ſeduced by the deluſions of a ſuperſtition ſtiled methodiſm, raiſed upon the affectation of ſuperior ſanctity, and maintained by pretenſions to divine illumination. Many thouſands in the lower ranks of life were infected with this ſpecies of enthuſiaſm, by the unwearied endeavours of a few obſcure preachers, ſuch as Whitfield, and the two Weſleys, who propogated their doctrines to the moſt remote corners of the Britiſh dominions, and found means to lay the whole kingdom under contribution. Fanaticiſm alſo formed a league with falſe philoſophy. One Hutchinſon, a viſionary, intoxicated with the fumes of rabbinical learning, pretended to deduce all demonſtration from Hebrew roots, and to confine all human knowledge to the five books of Moſes. His diſciples became numerous after his death. With the methodiſts, they denied the merit of good works; and bitterly inveighed againſt Newton as an ignorant pretender, who had preſumed to ſet up his own ridiculous chimæras in oppoſition to the ſacred philoſophy of the Pentateuch. But the moſt extraordinary ſect which diſtinguiſhed this reign was that of the moravians, or hernhutters, imported from Germany by count Zinzendorf, who might have been termed the Melchizedeck of his followers, inaſmuch as he aſſumed among them the threefold character of prophet, prieſt, and king. They could not be ſo properly ſtiled a ſect, as the diſciples of an original, who had invented a new ſyſtem of religion. Their chief adoration was paid to the Second Perſon in the Trinity: the Firſt they treated with the moſt ſhocking neglect. Some of their tenets were blaſphemous, ſome indecent, and others ridiculouſly abſurd. Their diſcipline was a ſtrange mixture of devotion and impurity. Their exterior worſhip conſiſted of hymns, prayers, and ſermons; the hymns extremely ludicrous, and often indecent, alluding to the ſide-hole or wound which Chriſt received from a ſpear in his ſide while he remained upon the croſs. Their ſermons frequently contained very groſs incentives to the work of propagation. Their private exerciſes are ſaid to have abounded with ſuch rites and myſteries as we cannot explain with any regard to decorum. They profeſſed a community of goods, and were governed as one family, in temporals as well as ſpirituals, by a council, or kind of preſbytery, in which the count, as their ordinary, preſided. In caſes of doubt, or great conſequence, theſe pretended to conſult the Saviour, and to decide from immediate inſpiration; ſo that they boaſted of being under the immediate direction of a Theocracy; though, in fact, they were ſlaves to the moſt dangerous kind of deſpotiſm: for as often as any individual of the community pretended to think for himſelf, or differ in opinion from the ordinary and his band of aſſociates, the oracle decreed that he ſhould be inſtantly ſent upon the miſſion which they had fixed in Greenland, or to the colony they had eſtabliſhed in Pennſylvania. As theſe religioniſts conſiſted chiefly of manufacturers, who appeared very ſober, orderly, and induſtrious; and their chief declared his intention of proſecuting works of public emolument, they obtained a ſettlement under a parliamentary ſanction in England, where they ſoon made a conſiderable number of proſelytes, before their principles were fully diſcovered and explained.

Many ingenious treatiſes on metaphyſics and morality appeared in the courſe of this reign, and a philoſophical ſpirit of enquiry diffuſed itſelf to the fartheſt extremities of the united kingdom. Though few diſcoveries of importance were made in medicine, yet that art was well underſtood in all its different branches, and many of its profeſſors diſtinguiſhed themſelves in other provinces of literature. Beſides the medical eſſays of London and Edinburgh, the phyſician's library was enriched with many uſeful modern productions; with the works of the claſſical Friend, the elegant Mead, the accurate Huxham, and the philoſophical Pringle. The art of midwifery was elucidated by ſcience, reduced to fixed principles, and almoſt wholly conſigned into the hands of men practitioners. The reſearches of anatomy were proſecuted to ſome curious diſcoveries, by the ingenuity and dexterity of a Hunter and a Munro. The numerous hoſpitals in London contributed to the improvement of ſurgery, which was brought to perfection under the auſpices of a Cheſelden and a Sharpe. The advantages of agriculture, which had long flouriſhed in England, extended themſelves gradually to the moſt remote and barren provinces of the iſland.

The mechanic powers were well underſtood, and judiciouſly applied to many uſeful machines of neceſſity and convenience. The mechanical arts had attained to all that perfection which they were capable of acquiring; but the avarice and oppreſſion of contractors obliged the handicraftſman to exert his ingenuity, not in finiſhing his work well, but in affording it cheap; in purchaſing bad materials, and performing his taſk in a hurry; in concealing flaws, ſubſtituting ſhow for ſolidity, and ſacrificing reputation to the thirſt of lucre. Thus, many of the Engliſh manufactures, being found ſlight and unſerviceable, grew into diſcredit abroad; thus the art of producing them more perfect may in time be totally loſt at home. The cloths now made in England are inferior in texture and fabric to thoſe which were manufactured in the beginning of the century; and the ſame judgment may be pronounced upon almoſt every article of hardware. The razors, knives, ſciſſars, hatchets, ſwords, and other edge-utenſils, prepared for exportation, are generally ill-tempered, half-finiſhed, flawed or brittle; and the muſkets, which are ſold for ſeven or eight ſhillings a-piece to the exporter, ſo careleſsly and unconſcientiouſly prepared, that they cannot be uſed without imminent danger of mutilation; accordingly, one hardly meets with a negro man upon the coaſt of Guinea, in the neighbourhood of the Britiſh ſettlements, who has not been wounded or maimed in ſome manner, by the burſting of the Engliſh fire-arms. The advantages of this traffic, carried on at the expence of character and humanity, will naturally ceaſe, whenever thoſe Africans can be ſupplied more honeſtly by the traders of any other nation.

Genius in writing ſpontaneouſly aroſe, and though neglected by the great, flouriſhed under the culture of a public which had pretenſions to taſte, and piqued itſelf on encouraging literary merit. Swift and Pope we have mentioned on another occaſion. Young ſtill ſurvived, a venerable monument of poetical talents. Thomſon, the poet of the Seaſons, diſplayed a luxuriancy of genius in deſcribing the beauties of nature. Akenſide and Armſtrong excelled in didactic poetry. Even the Epopœa did not diſdain an Engliſh dreſs, but appeared to advantage in the Leonidas of Glover, and the Epigoniad of Wilkie. The public acknowledged a conſiderable ſhare of dramatic merit in the tragedies of Young, Mallet, Home, and ſome other leſs diſtinguiſhed authors. Very few regular comedies, during this period, were exhibited on the Engliſh theatre, which, however, produced many leſs laboured pieces, abounding with ſatire, wit, and humour. The Careleſs Huſband of Cibber, and Suſpicious Huſband of Hoadly, are the only comedies of this age that bid fair for reaching poſterity. The exhibition of the ſtage were improved to the moſt exquiſite entertainment by the talents and management of Garrick, who greatly ſurpaſſed all his predeceſſors of this, and perhaps every other nation, in his genius for acting; in the ſweetneſs and variety of his tones, the irreſiſtible magic of his eye; the fire and vivacity of his action, the elegance of attitude, and the whole pathos of expreſſion. Quin excelled in dignity and declamation, as well as in exhibiting ſome characters of humour, equally exquiſite and peculiar. Mrs. Cibber breathed the whole ſoul of female tenderneſs and paſſion, and Mrs. Pritchard diſplayed all the dignity of diſtreſs. That Great-Britain was not barren of poets at this period appears from the detached performances of Johnſon, Maſon, Gray, the two Whiteheads, and the two Wartons, beſides a great number of other bards, who have ſported in lyric poetry, and acquired the applauſe of their fellow-citizens. Candidates for literary fame appeared even in the higher ſphere of life, embelliſhed by the nervous ſtile, ſuperior ſenſe, and extenſive erudition of a Corke, by the delicate taſte, the poliſhed muſe, and tender feelings of a Lyttelton. King ſhone unrivalled in Roman eloquence. Even the female ſex diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their taſte and ingenuity. Miſs Carter rivalled the celebrated Dacier in learning and critical knowledge: Mrs. Lennox ſignaliſed herſelf by many ſucceſsful efforts of genius, both in poetry and proſe; and Miſs Reid excelled the celebrated Roſalba in portrait-painting, both in miniature and at large, in oil, as well as in crayons. The genius of Cervantes was transfuſed into the novels of Fielding, who painted the characters, and ridiculed the follies of life with equal ſtrength, humour, and propriety. The field of hiſtory and biography was cultivated by many writers of ability, among whom we diſtinguiſh the copious Guthrie, the circumſtantial Ralph, the laborious Carte, the learned and elegant Robertſon, and above all the ingenious, penetrating, and comprehenſive Hume, whom we rank among the firſt writers of the age, both as an hiſtorian and philoſopher. Nor let us forget the merit conſpicuous in the works of Campbell, remarkable for candour, intelligence, and preciſion. Johnſon, inferior to none in philoſophy, philology, poetry, and claſſical learning, ſtand foremoſt as an eſſayiſt, juſtly admired for the dignity, ſtrength, and variety of his ſtile, as well as for the agreeable manner in which he inveſtigates the human heart, tracing every intereſting emotion, and opening all the ſources of morality. The laudable aim of inliſting the paſſions on the ſide of virtue was ſucceſsfully purſued by Richardſon, in his Pamela, Clariſſa, and Grandiſon; a ſpecies of writing equally new and extraordinary, where, mingled with much ſuperfluity, we find a ſublime ſyſtem of ethics, an amazing knowledge and command of human nature. Many of the Greek and Roman claſſics made their appearance in Engliſh tranſlations, which were favourably received as works of merit; among theſe we place, after Pope's Homer, Virgil by Pitt and Warton, Horace by Francis, Polybius by Hampton, and Sophocles by Franklin. The war introduced a variety of military treatiſes, chiefly tranſlated from the French language; and a free country, like Great-Britain, will always abound with political tracts and lucubrations. Every literary production of merit, calculated for amuſement or inſtruction, that appeared in any country or language of Chriſtendom was immediately imported, and naturaliſed among the Engliſh people. Never was the purſuit after knowledge ſo univerſal, or literary merit more regarded, than at this juncture by the body of the Britiſh nation; but it was honoured by no attention from the throne, and little indulgence did it reap from the liberality of particular patrons. The reign of queen Anne was propitious to the fortunes of Swift and Pope, who lived in all the happy pride of independence. Young, ſequeſtered from courts and preferment, poſſeſſed a moderated benefice in the country, and employed his time in a conſcientious diſcharge of his eccleſiaſtical functions. Thomſon, with the moſt benevolent heart that ever warmed the human breaſt, maintained a perpetual war with the difficulties of a narrow fortune. He enjoyed a place in Chancery by the bounty of lord Talbot, of which he was diveſted by the ſucceeding chancellor. He afterwards enjoyed a ſmall penſion from Frederick prince of Wales, which was withdrawn in the ſequel. About two years before his death, he obtained, by the intereſt of his friend lord Lyttelton, a comfortable place; but he did not live to taſte the bleſſing of eaſy circumſtances, and died in debt [t]. None of the reſt whom we have named enjoyed any ſhare of the royal bounty, except W. Whitehead, who ſucceeded to the place of laureat at the death of Cibber; and ſome of them, whoſe merit was the moſt univerſally acknowledged, remained expoſed to all the ſtorms of indigence, and all the ſtings of mortification. While the queen lived, ſome countenance was given to learning. She converſed with Newton, and correſponded with Leibnitz. She took pains to acquire popularity; the royal family, on certain days, dined in public, for the ſatisfaction of the people: the court was animated with a freedom of ſpirit and vivacity, which rendered it at once brilliant and agreeable. At her death that ſpirit began to languiſh, and a total ſtagnation of gaiety and good-humour enſued. It was ſucceeded by a ſullen calm, an ungracious reſerve, and a ſtill rotation of inſipid forms [u].

England was not defective in other arts that embelliſh and amuſe. Muſic became a faſhionable ſtudy, and its profeſſors were generally careſſed by the public. An Italian opera was maintained at a great expence, and well ſupplied with foreign performers. Private concerts were inſtituted in every corner of the metropolis. The compoſitions of Handel were univerſally admired, and he himſelf lived in affluence. It muſt be owned at the ſame time, that Geminiani was neglected, though his genius commanded eſteem and veneration. Among the few natives of England who diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their talents in this art, Green, Howard, Arne, and Boyce, were the moſt remarkable.

The Britiſh ſoil, which had hitherto been barren in the article of painting, now produced ſome artiſts of extraordinary merit. Hogarth excelled all the world in exhibiting the ſcenes of ordinary life; in humour, character, and expreſſion. Hayman became eminent for hiſtorical deſigns and converſation pieces. Reynols and Ramſay diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their ſuperior merit in portraits; a branch that was ſucceſsfully cultivated by many other Engliſh painters. Wootton was famous for repreſenting live animals in general; Seymour for race-horſes; Lambert, and the Smiths, for land-ſcapes; and Scot for ſea-pieces. Several ſpirited attempts were made on hiſtorical ſubjects, but little progreſs was made in the ſublime parts of painting. Eſſays of this kind were diſcouraged by a falſe taſte, founded upon a reprobation of Britiſh genius. The art of engraving was brought to perfection by Strange, and laudably practiſed by Grignion, Baron, Ravenet, and ſeveral other maſters; great improvements were made in mezzotinto, miniature, and enamel. Many fair monuments of ſculpture or ſtatuary were raiſed by Ryſbrach, Roubilliac, and Wilton. Architecture which had been cheriſhed by the elegant taſte of a Burlington, ſoon became a favourite ſtudy; and many magnificent edifices were reared in different parts of the kingdom. Ornaments were carved in wood, and moulded in ſtucco, with all the delicacy of execution, but a paſſion for novelty had introduced into gardening, building, and furniture, an abſurd Chineſe taſte, equally void of beauty and convenience. Improvements in the liberal and uſeful arts will doubtleſs be the conſequence of that encouragement given to merit by the ſociety inſtituted for theſe purpoſes which we have deſcribed on another occaſion. As for the Royal Society, it ſeems to have degenerated in its reſearches, and to have had very little ſhare, for half a century at leaſt, in extending the influence of true philoſophy.

We ſhall conclude this reign with a detail of the forces and fleets of Great-Britain, from whence the reader will conceive a juſt idea of her opulence and power.

[t] However he was neglected when living, his memory has been honoured with peculiar marks of public regard, in an ample ſubſcription for a new edition of his works, the profits to be employed in erecting a monument to his fame in Weſtminſter-Abbey; a ſubſcription to which his preſent majeſty king George III. has liberally contributed. The remaining ſurplus was diſtributed among his poor relations.

[u] George II. by his queen Caroline, had two ſons and five daughters who attained the age of maturity. Frederick prince of Wales, father to his preſent majeſty George III. William duke of Cumberland; Anne, the princeſs royal, married to the late prince of Orange, and mother to the preſent ſtadtholder; Mary, landgraviate of Heſſe-Caſſel; Louiſa, late queen of Denmark; Amelia and Carolina who were never married.

BRIEF STATEMENT

Of the ARMIES and FLEETS of Great-Britain about the Middle of the Year 1760.

LAND FORCES.

In GREAT-BRITAIN under Lord Viſcount Ligonier, commander in chief.

2 Troops of Horſe-Guards.
2 ——— Horſe-Grenadiers.
5 Regiments of Dragoons.
3 ——— Foot-guards.
23 ——— Foot.

In IRELAND, under Lieut. Gen. Earl of Rothes, commander in chief.

2 Regiments of Horſe.
8 ——— Dragoons.
17 ——— Foot.

In JERSEY, under Col. Boſcawen.
1 Regiment of Foot.

At GIBRALTER, under Lieut. Gen. Earl of Home, governor.
6 Regiments of Foot.

In GERMANY, under Lieut. Gen. Marquis of Granby, commander in chief.

1 Regiment of Horſe-Guards.
2 ——— Horſe.
3 ——— Dragoon-Guards.
6 ——— Dragoons.
16 ——— Foot.

In garriſon at EMBDEN.
2 Regiments of Highlanders.

In NORTH-AMERICA, under Major-General Amherſt, commander in chief.
21 Regiments of Foot.

In the WEST-INDIES.
5 ½ Regiments of Foot.

In AFRICA.
2 Regiments of Foot.

In the EAST-INDIES.
4 Battalions of Foot.

Total: 31 Regiments of Horſe and Dragoons.
97 ——— Foot.

Beſides theſe, Great-Britain maintained Hanoverian, Heſſian, and other German auxiliaries, to the amount of 60,000.

NAVY.

At or near home, under Sir Edward Hawk, Admiral Boſcawen, &c.

		Guns.			Guns.
3	Ships of	100	5	Ships of	70
6	———	90	1	———	66
1	———	84	8	———	64
3	———	80	12	———	60
13	———	74	10	———	50

In the EAST-INDIES, under Vice-Admiral Pocoke.

		Guns.			Guns.
2	Ships of	74	7	Ships of	60
1	———	68	1	———	58
1	———	66	3	———	50
2	———	64

In the WEST-INDIES, under Rear-Admiral Holmes.

		Guns.			Guns.
1	Ship of	90	1	Ship of	66
2	———	80	6	———	64
1	———	74	4	———	60
2	———	70	2	———	50
1	———	68

In NORTH-AMERICA, under Commodore Lord Colville.

		Guns.			Guns.
1	Ship of	74	2	Ships of	64
3	———	70	3	———	60
1	———	66	2	———	50

In the MEDITERRANEAN, under Vice Admiral Saunders.

		Guns.			Guns.
2	ſhips of	90	3	ſhips of	60
1	———	74	3	———	50
1	———	64

At or near Home	62
In the Eaſt-Indies	17
Weſt-Indies	20
North-America	12
Mediterranean	10
Total	121

Liſt of Men of War, French and Engliſh, taken, ſunk, or caſually loſt,

From the Year 1755, to the Year 1760.

13 JY 60

FRENCH Ships taken.

		Guns.			Guns.
2	Ships of	84	2	Ships of	32
2	———	74	2	———	28
2	———	66	2	———	26
7	———	64	2	———	24
1	———	50	3	———	22
1	———	48	2	———	20
1	———	44	3	———	16
2	———	40	2	———	12
1	———	38	1	———	10
4	———	36	1	———	8

1706

Ditto deſtroyed.

		Guns.			Guns.
3	Ships of	84	1	Ship of	24
9	———	74	1	———	22
3	———	64	1	———	20
1	———	56	1	———	18
2	———	50	2	———	16
8	———	36	6	———	8
3	———	32

1730

FRENCH Ships caſually.

		Guns.			Guns.
1	Ship of	74	1	Ship of	34
1	———	70	1	———	32
3	———	64	2	———	28
1	———	56	3	———	24
2	———	50	1	———	20
1	———	44

786

Deſtroyed	1730
Taken	1706
Total	4222

ENGLISH Ships taken.

		Guns.			Guns.
1	Ship of	60	2	Ships of	12
1	———	50	1	———	10

144

Ditto deſtroyed.

		Guns.			Guns.
1	Ship of	24	1	Ship of	8
2	———	20

72

Ditto caſually loſt.

		Guns.			Guns.
1	Ship of	90	1	Ship of	30
1	———	80	1	———	28
2	———	74	1	———	24
2	———	64	1	———	20
1	———	60	2	———	8

644

Deſtroyed	72
Taken	144
Total	860

END OF VOL. I. OF TINDAL'S CONTINUATION.

THE

INDEX

To TINDAL's George I. and SMOLLETT's George II.

VOL. II.

N. B. The numbers expreſſed by figures refer to the pages; K. ſtands for King, D. for Duke, &c.

A.

ABERDEEN, the clergy and people of that place preſent addreſſes to the pretender, 48, 49

Abington, earl of, Montague-Venable Bertie, is againſt the treaty of commerce, 81

Act to explain the act for declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubjects, and ſettling the ſucceſſion to the crown, 27, for repealing a clauſe in it, 69, for increaſing the South-Sea capital ſtoc, 139. See South-Sea company. Act to ſuſpend the habeas corpus, 28, for ſeptennial parliaments, 63, for a general fund, with a clauſe eſtabliſhing the ſinking-fund, 90, to reſtrain the ſubgovernor, &c, of the South-Sea company from going out of the kingdom, 152, in favour of the ſufferers by the South-ſea affair, 160, for ſuppreſſing the mint, 178

Addiſon, Joſeph, appointed ſecretary to the lords of the regency, 4, made ſecretary of ſtate, 84, added to the ſecret committee, 94, writes the Old Whig, 122, dies, 735, an account of him, ibid.

Addreſs from the corporation of Wigan in behalf of Q. Anne's late miniſtry, 19, addreſſes upon the intended invaſion from Sweden, 76, &c. for a copy of the treaty with Sweden, 82, about the E. of Oxford, 96, of the commons, in relation to their proceedings againſt the South-Sea directors, 159, upon the diſcovery of the plot, 171

Aiſlabie, John, made treaſurer of the navy, 11, his ſpeech againſt the E. of Strafford, 25, and upon the E. of Oxford's impeachment, 26, 28, propoſes the lowering of the gold ſpecies, 71, reſigns his places, 154, has great quantities of South-Sea ſtoc given him, 155, expelled the houſe, and ordered to be committed to the Tower, 158

Alberoni, cardinal, makes great preparations in Spain, 107, his anger at receiving admiral Byng's letter, 109, account of him, 111, his letter upon the defeat of the Spaniſh fleet, 114, acts in favour of the pretender, 115, 120, forms a plot againſt the regent of France, ibid. conſents to a peace, 113, diſgraced, and ever unfortunate, 135

Alliance, triple, 74, triple and quadruple, 107, between England and Sweden, 74, between Great-Britain, France, and Spain, 163, between Great-Britain, France and Denmark, 200

Angleſea, Arthur Anneſley, E. of, voted an enemy to the kingdom, for being one of the adviſers for breaking the army, 58, removed from the king's council and ſervice, ibid.

Annandale, James Johnſtoun, marquis of, his ſpeech about the peerage-bill, 122

Argyle, Archibald Campbel, D. of, made groom of the ſtole to the prince of Wales, 8, and commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, 10, ſets out for that kingdom, 31, engages the E. of Mar near Dumblain, 44, &c. ſpeaks for the ſeptennial-bill, 66, removed from all his employments, 69, made ſteward of the houſhold, 121

Army; motion for reducing the army, 85, is reduced, 100, debates about a ſtanding army, 101, 105, articles for the regulation and government of the army, ibid.

Aſſociation entered into throughout the kingdom, 39

Athol, John Murray D. of, cauſes K. George to be proclaimed at Perth, 9

Atterbury, Francis biſhop of Rocheſter, is the ſuppoſed author of Engliſh Advice, 16, adviſes the D. of Ormond to leave England, 24, refuſes to ſign the declarations teſtifying an abhorrence of the rebellion, 40, endeavours to juſtify the univerſity of Oxford with regard to the riot there, 80, his ſpeech about the South-Sea affair, 153, againſt the quakers, 167, is apprehended and committed to the Tower, 170, his commitment cauſes great uneaſineſs, 171, he is prayed for, ibid. ſir William Young's ſpeech againſt him, 175, it is voted that he had been concerned in the conſpiracy, ibid. bill to inflict pains and penalties upon him, ibid. is brought to his trial, ibid. the bill againſt him paſſes, 177, deprived of all his offices, and baniſhed the realm, ibid. carried to France, 179, ſays, he was exchanged, ibid. dr. Sacheverell left him 500l. 184

Auſtrian dominions; the ſucceſſion guaranteed by Spain, 189

Abercrombie, general, appointed to ſucceed general Shirley, 326, ſituation of affairs in North-America on his arrival at Albany 328, he ſucceeds to the chief command in America, 389

Aberdeen, Gordon, earl of, attends the duke of Cumberland at Aberdeen, 262

Abingdon, Bartie E. of, his motion concerning the Scottiſh election, 224

Adolphus, Frederick, ſucceeds to the crown of Sweden, 290, conſpiracy diſcovered to make him abſolute, 333, he threatens to abdicate, ibid. his forces invade Pruſſian, Pomerania, 368, his general's declaration, ibid. ſome of his territories ſeized by the Pruſſians, 371, his anſwer to the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, 372, advantages gained by his troops in Pomerania, 485, their further operations there, 488

African trade, meaſures taken with regard to, 275, 281, 283, 380

Affry, count d', his memorial to the Dutch, concerning the Engliſh cruiſers, Oſtend, and Nieuport, 366, his counter memorial to that of England, 454

Aiguillon, duke of, marches againſt general Bligh, 385, his politeneſs to the Engliſh officers, 387, aſſemblies a body of forces for the invaſion of Britain, 428

Aix, iſle of, taken, 349

Aix-la-Chapelle, reflections on the peace of, 273, 274, 455, rejoicings for, 278

Albany, in New-York, deſcribed, 307,

Albemarle, Keppel E. of, reclaims ſome Engliſh traders taken by the French in America, 299, he is amuſed at Paris, 301, 308, his death, 310

Alcide, French man of war, taken, 311

Algerines take and plunder an Engliſh packet-boat, 280

Allied army aſſembles under the D. of Cumberland, 361, ſkirmiſhes with the French, ibid. paſſes the Weſer, ibid. worſted at Haſtenbeck by the French, 362, retreats to Hoya, 363, and thence to Strade, ibid. diſperſed by the convention of Cloſter-Severn, ibid. re-aſſembled under prince Ferdinand, 374, obtains ſome advantages over the French, whom it obliges to evacuate part of the Hanoverian dominions, ibid. but is checked at Zell, ibid. ſkirmiſhes with the French, 396, harraſſes the French in their retreat, ibid. paſſes the Rhine, and obtains divers advantages over them, ibid. gains the battle of Crevelt, ibid. defeated at Sangerſhauſen, 398, worſts M. de Chevert, at Meer, ibid. repaſſes the Rhine, ibid. cantoned in the landgraviate of Heſſe-Caſſel, the biſhopricks of Munſter, Paderborn, and Hildeſheim, 399, ſkirmiſhes between them and the enemy, 447, worſted in Bergin, ibid. harraſſed in retreating, ibid. defeats the French at Minden, 448, &c. and Coveldt, 449, complaints of its violating the neutrality of the Dutch territories, 454, ſkirmiſhes between it and the French, 480, 481, defeated at Corbach, 482, victorious at Exdorff, ibid. at Warbourg, ibid. ſkirmiſhes with the French, 483, &c.

America, troops in, ſubjected to the mutiny act, 310, maritime laws of England extended to it, 320, and the power of inliſting indented ſervants, ibid. ſcheme for making ſalt in it, 381. See Weſt-Indies.
America, North, general view of the Britiſh colonies in it, 306, &c. tranſactions in it, 278, 299, 308, 312, 352, 435, 472, 476
American contract examined, 344
Amherſt, general, reduces Cape-Breton, 389, returns to New-England, and ſets out for Albany, ibid. receives the thanks of the houſe of commons, 422, takes poſſeſſion of Ticonderoga and Crown-Point, 436, embarks on lake Champlain, 437, his opperations there, and after his return to Crown-Point, ibid. he arrives at Oſwego, 475, ſails down the river St. Lawrence, and reduces the French fort at Iſle Royal, ibid. he takes Montreal, ibid.
Anamaboe, the Caboceiro of, his equivocal conduct, 354
Andrews, captain, his engagement with part of a French ſquadron, 311
Angel, captain, his ſucceſs, 321
Angria, reſolutions taken againſt him, 331, his fort of Geriah taken, and fleet deſtroyed, 332
Anhalt Cothan, prince of, taken priſoner by the allies, 482
Anhalt-Deſſau (Maurice) prince of, collects a Pruſſian army, 357, which he conducts into Bohemia, 358, his advanced poſts at Pirna attacked by the Auſtrians, 367, he is ſent to ſecure Berlin, 368, conducts the third diviſion of the Pruſſians into Moravia, 399, is wounded and taken at Hochkirchent, 402, his conduct at Minden, 348
Anjengo, in the Eaſt-Indies, diſcribed, 303
Annapolis, in Maryland, deſcribed, 307
———, in Nova-Scotia, the inhabitants of, rebel, 300, and are reduced by major Laurence, ibid.
Annuities, ſome of, conſolidated, 291, 463
Anſon, commodore, ſails for the South-Sea, 236, his return and account of his voyage, 255, he and admiral Warren defeat and take a French ſquadron, 270, created a lord, ibid.
Anſon, lord, appointed firſt lord of the admiralty, 348, ſteers with ſir Edward Hawke to the bay of Biſcay, 383, ſeveral French veſſels driven aſhore by ſome of his cruſers, 387
Anteuil, M. d', taken priſoner, 306
Antigallican privateer takes a French Eaſt-India ſhip, 351, petition of the owners of, 380
Antrobus, captain, his ſucceſs, 426,
Apché, M. d', worſted by admiral Pococke, 393, he retires to the iſland of Bourbon, ibid. defeated a third time by admiral Pococke, 445
Apraxin, general, takes Memel, 365, engages mareſchal Lehwald at Norkitten, 367, makes a haſty retreat from Pruſſia, ibid. diſgraced and tried, 394
Aquilon French man of war deſtroyed, 375,
Aram, Eugene, an account of, 424
Arc en-Ciel French man of war taken, 330
Arcot, diſpute about the government of the province of, 304, the whole reduced by colonel Coote, 446
Aremberg, duke of, takes Gabel, 365, worſted by prince Henry of Pruſſia near Pretſch, 452
Arethuſa, French frigate, taken, 426
Argyle, Campbell duke of, oppoſes the bill againſt the city of Edinburgh, 228, and the convention with Spain, 233, reſigns his place, 237, his ſpeech on the army, 238, re-accepts his places, and lays them down, 243, his death, 252
———, Campbell, D. of, his remarks on the bill for the Britiſh fiſhery, 283
Argenſon, M. d' removed from his office in the French miniſtry, 356
Armentiere, M. d', aſſiſts in paſſing the Weſer, 362, takes poſſeſſion of Gottingen, 363, worſted by the hereditary prince, 449, his attempts to relieve Munſter, ibid.
Armiger, brigadier, attends general Hopſon to the Weſt-Indies, 431
Artiſts, eminent, an account of, 493
Arts, &c. ſocieties inſtituted for the encouragement of, 390
Aſhly, major, killed, 314
Aſtronomers ſent to the Eaſt-Indies, 478
Aſylum for orphans inſtituted, 411
Attouguia, count de, put to death for a conſpiracy againſt the king of Portugal, 407, 456
Aubeterre, count d', his intrigues at the court of Vienna, 316, his declaration there 317
Aubry, M. defeated and taken by ſir W. Johnſon at Niagara, 437
Auguſtus III. elector of Saxony, choſen K. of Poland, declares for the Q. of Hungary, 254, his electorate invaded by the K. of Pruſſia, 256, borrows money from the elector of Hanover, 284, engages his vote for electing the arch-duke king of the Romans, in conſideration of a ſubſidy from England, 290, a new ſubſidy granted him by England, on account of Hanover, 309, declines engaging in a confederacy with Ruſſia, Hungary, &c. 333, his electoral dominions invaded by the king of Pruſſia, 334, and himſelf blocked up with his troops at Pirna, ibid. his queen inſulted, and cabinet rifled, 335, he eſcapes to Koningſtein, ibid. his letter to his general concerning his forces, ibid. he retires to Poland, ibid. his troops are obliged to ſurrender to the king of Pruſſia, who compels them to incorporate with his army, ibid. his memorial at the Hague, ibid. the Pruſſian anſwer to it, 336, death and character of his queen, 374, his electorate laid under contribution, and ordered to furniſh recruits for the Pruſſians, 394, the ſuburs of his capital of Dreſden burnt by the Pruſſians, 403, his miniſter's memorial to the diet of the empire on that outrage, ibid. his Saxon ſubjects grievouſly oppreſſed by the K. of Pruſſia, 404, his ſon, prince Charles, elected D. of Courland, 405, operations of the Imperialiſts and Pruſſians in his electorate, 452, his capital there much hurt by the K. of Pruſſia in an attempt upon it, 486, publiſhes a remonſtrance on the Pruſſian behavionr at the ſiege of Dreſden, &c. 489
Auvel, M. d', takes Embden, 258
Auſtrians, hoſtilities commenced between them and the Pruſſians, 334, whom they fight at Lowoſchutz, 335, ſkirmiſhes between them and the Pruſſians on the frontiers of Bohemia, 357, routed at Reichenberg, 358, and near Prague, ibid. &c. their brave defence of Prague, 359, they defeat the Pruſſians at Kolin, 360, they take Gabel, 365, deſtroy Zittau, with many circumſtances of cruelty, 366, ſkirmiſhes with the Pruſſians, 367, decline an engagement with the K. of Pruſſia, 368, they attac the Pruſſians at Goerlitz, ibid. take Lignitz, ibid. lay Berlin under contribution, ibid. they take Schweidnitz, 369, defeat the prince of Bevern near Breſlau, 370, they are routed at Liſſa, ibid, &c. they force the Pruſſians to raiſe the ſiege of Olmutz, and to retire into Bohemia, 400, harraſs them in their march, ibid. joined by the imperial army, 401, defeats the K. of Pruſſia at Hochkirchen, 402, &c. ſkirmiſhes between them and the allies, 447, 450, and the Pruſſians, 451, a detachment of them ſent to re-enforce the Ruſſians, ibid. and contribute much to the victory at Cünerſdorf, 452, a body of them worſted at Corbitz and Hoyerſwerda, ibid. and at Pretſch, ibid. they ſurround and take a Pruſſian army at Maxen, 453, and another under general Diercke, ibid. advantages gained by them againſt the Pruſſians in Saxony, 485, they defeat an army of Pruſſians at Landſhut, and reduce Glatz, ibid. they are worſted at Lignitz, 487, and under general Beck, ibid. they and the Ruſſians poſſeſs themſelves of Berlin, 487, they take Torgau and Leipſick, 488, are worſted at Torgau, ibid.
Authors, eminent, an account of, 492
Aveiro, duke de, put to death for a conſpiracy againſt the K. of Portugal, 407, 456

B.

Baltick; a fleet ſent thither, 84, 92, 124, 143, which is affirmed to be an infringement of the act of ſettlement, 160, a motion to know the reaſons of ſending it, 199
Bank; their loans, 87, the Bank act, 90, the Bank preſent their propoſals to the government, 138, Bank contract, 148, dropped, 150
Barrier-treaty, with the ſtates, ſee vol. III. 645, ſigned, 13, ratified, 47
Bath, order of the, revived, 187
Bathurſt, Allen, his ſpeeches in parliament, 161, 172, 174, 176, 182, 194, 198
Battle of Preſton, 42, of Dumblain, 44
Benſon, William, writes the Plebian, 122, removed from his place, 123
Beretti Landi, marquis de, ſigns the quadruple alliance, 131, delivers a plan of peace to the ſtates-general, 135
Berkley, James, E. of, ſails to Holland to bring over K. George, 7, made one of the lords of the bed chamber, 8
Berwick, James Fitz-James, D. of, takes Fontarabia and Fort-Paſſage, 133, and St. Sebaſtian and Port-Antonio, 134
Bill to regulate the land-forces, 21, 23, for recognizing K. George's title to the crown, and for the better ſecurity of his perſon and government, in the parliament of Ireland, 57, to attaint the pretender and D. of Ormond, ibid. for ſeptennial parliaments, 25, &c. to prohibit commerce with Sweden, 80, about mutiny and deſertion, ibid. peerage-bill, 121, &c. rejected, 136, for ſecuring the dependency of Ireland, 137, for enabling the South-Sea company to increaſe their ſtoc, 138, &c. for ingrafting nine millions of the South-Sea ſtoc into the Bank, 152, &c. for the relief of the ſufferers by the South-Sea company, 159, &c. to prevent the infection from the plague, 166, &c. for altering the quakers affirmation, 167, for the freedom of elections of members of parliament, ibid. to lay a tax on papiſts, 173, to inflict pains and penalties on Kelly and Plunket, and on Bp. Atterbury, 175, to prevent the king's ſubjects from being concerned in the Oſtend Eaſt-India company, 178, for leſſening the public debts, 181, to indemnify the maſters in chancery, 186

Bolton, Charles Paulet, D. of, made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 84, his ſpeech to the parliament of that kingdom, 135

Bourbon, D. of, nominated prime miniſter in France, 181, removed from that employment, 190

Bremen and Verden made over to K. George, 22, the pretender's obſervation about it, 41, the king of Sweden enraged at this acquiſition, 72, 75, &c. annexed to the electorate of Hanover, 179, the emperor denies K. George the inveſtiture of them, 190

Bridgwater, Scroop Egerton E. of, created duke, 142, forms a bubble for building houſes in London, &c. 145

Bromley, William, diſmiſſed from his place, 10

Buckinghamſhire, John Sheffield D. of, does not attend at the coronation of K. George, 12, dies, 164

Byng, George, made one of the commiſſioners of the admiralty, 11, takes upon him the command of the fleet, 28, made one of the commiſſioners of the admiralty, 84, 107, ſent with a fleet into the Baltick, 84, and with a large ſquadron into the Mediterranean, 85, 108, his inſtructions, ibid. diſpatches his ſecretary with a letter to colonel Stanhope, 109, the king of Spain's anſwer to his letter, ibid. ſends a letter to the marquis de Lede, 110, defeats the Spaniſh fleet, ibid. the king's letter to him upon that occaſion, 111, receives a gracious letter from the emperor, with his picture, 112, motion in the houſe of lords to have his inſtructions laid before them, 116, confiſcates all French ſhips in the ſervice of Spain, 124, lends the Imperialiſts cannon and ammunition, 127, deſtroys ſome Spaniſh men of war in Meſſina road, 129, ſends cannon to Sicily, ibid. convoys the Imperialiſts to Trepani, 131, returns to England, 133, account and character of him, ibid.

Baker, Richard, his contract for the forces in North-America, approved of by the commons, 344

——, William, his contract for the forces in North-America, approved of by the commons, ibid.

Balaſore, in the Eaſt-Indies, deſcribed, 304

Balchen, ſir John, periſhes at ſea, 255

Balfour, capt. his bravery at Louiſbourg, 290

Balmerino, lord, joins the young chevalier, 260, ſurrenders, and is ſent to London, 263, tried and beheaded, 264

Banbury (Knollis) E. of, gallantry of his ſons, 472

Bankrupts.—See debtors.

Banks, mr. prepares a bill for the puniſhment of governors of plantations, 343

Barbary corſairs, their inſolence, 280

Barker, captain, ſent to burn two ſhips off Toulon, 427

Barlow, colonel, aſſiſts in taking Guadaloupe, 434

Barnard, ſir John, oppoſes the exciſe-bill, 219, his ſcheme for reducing the intereſt of the national debt, 227

——, mr remarkable tranſaction between the D. of Marlborough and him, 412, &c.

Barrington, lord, apppointed maſter of the wardrobe, 302, he reſigns, and is made ſecretary at war, 318, preſent eſtimates for raiſing new levies, 319, his letters to general Fowke, 328

——, general, ſails to the Weſt-Indies, 431, his operations at Guadaloupe, 432, 433, 434, 435, &c. he alſo reduces the iſlands of Deſeada, Los Santos, and Mariga-lante, ibid. returns to England, ibid.

——, captain, takes the Count de St. Florentine man of war, 426

Barton, captain, ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Morocco, 392

Bateman, lord, brings a meſſage to the commons relating to extraordinary expences of the war, 340

Bath, William Pulteney, created E. of, 244, oppoſes the diſmiſſion of the Hanoverians from Britiſh pay, 247, his ſpeech, on the mutiny-bill, 275, he oppoſes the bill for annexing the forfeited eſtates in Scotland to the crown, 291

Bathiani, mareſchal, routs the French and Palatinate troops at Pfiffenhoven, 256, his propoſal rejected at Laffeldt, 269

Bathurſt, L. Allen, his motions concerning the eſtates of the South-Sea directors, and ſinking-fund, 219, 220, oppoſes the convention with Spain, 233, appointed captain of the band of penſioners, 244

Batteaux deſcribed, 315

Battles and ſkirmiſhes; Aller, 374, Anclam, 485, Arani, 305, Aſch, 450, Augerbach, ibid. Bergen, 447, Braunau, 248, Breſlau, 266, Butzbach, 481, 483, Calcutta, 354, Campen, 484, Campo Santo, 250, Chandernagore, 445, Chateau-Dauphiné, 250, Chignecto, 300, Chincura, 445, Choczim, 234, Clifton, 261, Codogno, 265, Cohlin, 358, Coni, 255, Corbach, 482, Corbitz, 452, Coveldt, 449, Creveldt, 397, Crotſka, 234, Culloden, 262, Cunerſdorf, 451, Cutwa, 355, Caſlaw, 355, Dettingen, 249, Dillemburg, 480, Ebſtorff, 374, Eglen, 368, Eimbeck, 483, Elverick, 484, Erfurth, 368, Erſdorf, 481, Exdorff, 482, Exilles, 269, Eybach, 480, Falkirk, 461, Fehrbellin, 405, Fontenoy, 257, Fort du Queſne, 308, 313, 391, Freyberg, 485, Fulda, 450, Gabel, 485, Geiſſa, 481, Goerlitz, 389, Goldſpie, 262, Gotliebe, 367, Griefenberg, 450, Gruenewieſe, 403, Guaſtalla, 223, Haſtenbec, 362, &c. Herborn, 480, Heydemunden, 484, Hilkerſberg, 244, Hirſchfeldt, 357, Hochkirchen, 402, &c. Hoſenfeldt, 383, Hoya, 396, Hoyerſwerda, 452, Jabouka, 234, Invecary, 261, Kaurzim, 360, Kay, 451, Keith, 262, Kleinlinnes, 450, 268, Kolin, 360, Koveripauk, 305, Laffeldt, 480, Lake-George, 314, &c. Landſhut, 485, Landwernhagen, 399, Lang-Reichenbach, 488, Lawenthagen, 483, Lignitz, 389, 487, Liſſa, 370, Lowoſchutz, 335, Lutzen 481, Near Lyal-Henning, 391, Maſſaguath, 312, Maſulipatam, 444, Maxen, 453, Meer, 294, Meiſſen, 453, Minden, 448, &c. Molichſtadt, 447, Molwitz, 240, Montmorenci, 439, Munden, 483, Neuſtadt, 485, Niagara, 437, Nordheim, 483, Norkitten, 367, Norten, 483, Onondaga, 329, Oran, 217, Orſova, 231, in Paragua, 479, Parma, 223, Paſſberg, 450, Paſſelvalik, 488, Pfaffendorf, 487, Pirna, 256, 367, Prague, 358, &c. Preſton-Pans, 259, Pfiffenhoven, 256, Quebeck, 441, 474, Reichenberg, 357, 358, Rhynberg, 484, Roſbach, 369, &c. Roucoux, 265, Sababourg, 483, Samiaveram, 305, Sangerſhau en, 398, 240, Schaken, 484, Schermbeck, 485, Schweidnitz, 370, Soheite, 483, Sohr, 256, St. Caſs, 386, &c. St. Mary's, 431, Steinau, 485, Strehla, 487, Streiſſen, 403, Striegan, 256, Surat, 444, Syrinham, 305, Tecklenburgh, 361, Ticonderoga, 352, 390, Torgau, 485, 488, Vacha, 481, Villa-Franca, 255, Wafungen, 447, Wandewaſh, 446, Warbourg, 482, Willmenſtrand, 240, Zeilbach, 481, Zeirenberg, 483, Ziethen, 485, Zorndorf, 401, Zullichau, 451

Bavaria, Charles, elector of, re-enforced by a body of French troops, 240, crowned K. of Bohemia, at Prague, ibid. elected emperor by the name of Charles VII. 244, convention between him and the Q. of Hungary, 248, advances made by him towards a peace, 253, treaty between him, Pruſſia, &c. at Franckfort, ibid. his death, 256

——, Maximilian, elector of, accommodation between the queen of Hungary and him, ibid. accepts of a ſubſidy from Berlin, 264, debates thereon, 265, gets a new gratification on account of Hanover, 309, his troops join the French army, 335

Beauclerc, lord Aubrey, ſlain at Carthagena, 239

Beaufort (Somerſet) D. of, diſtinguiſhes himſelf in the oppoſition, 211

Beck, general, ſurpriſes and takes a battalion of Pruſſian grenadiers, 449, he defeats another detachment, 485, is worſted by the K. of Pruſſia, 487

Beckfort, William, eſq. ſupports the intereſt of Jamaica, 295, oppoſes extending the military laws to the Eaſt-India company's ſettlements, 302

Beckwith, colonel, diſtinguiſhes himſelf at Warbourg, 482

Bedford, D. of, his ſpeech againſt Hanoverian connexions, 247, 250, he oppoſes the continuation of the penalties of treaſon, 262, appointed firſt lord of the admiralty, 255, and ſecretary of ſtate, 271, oppoſes the bill for annexing the forfeited eſtates in Scotland to the crown, 291, his meſſage, as lord-lieutenant, to the Iriſh parliament, concerning a dreaded invaſion from France, 324, ſome incidents relative to his government there, 325

Beef allowed to be imported from Ireland into England, 415, 459

Beer, reflections on the price of, 459

Bell, mr. his gallant defence of Cape-Coaſt caſtle, 452

——, Enſign, treacherouſly wounded by the Indians, 472

Bellamy, rev. mr. and his ſon periſh at Calcutta, 331

Belleiſle, count de, his extraordinary retreat, 245, arreſted in Hanover, with his brother, the D. 255, ſlain at Exilles, 269

Belleiſle, duc de, his letter, as ſecretary at war, to the colonels in Germany, 397, his only ſon killed at Crevelt, ibid. his letters to mareſchal Contades, 450
———, mareſchal de, French frigate, taken, 471
Belliqueux French man of wartaken, 387
Bellona French frigate, taken, 426
Belloni, ſignor, his letter burnt by the hangman, 216
Bently, ſir John, ſignalizes himſelf in the action with M. de la Clue, 427, he is knighted, ibid.
Bergen-op-Zoom, the ſiege of, 269, &c.
Berkley, lord, takes a French frigate, 426
Berlin laid under contributionby the Auſtrians, 368, and by them and the Ruſſians, 487
Beſtucher, count, chancellor of Ruſſia, diſgraced, 400
Bevern, prince of, harraſſes the Auſtrians on the frontiers of Bohemia, 357, defeats count Konigſeg at Richenberg, 358, his bravery at the battle near Prague, 359, commands the Pruſſian camp in the king's abſence, 368, part of his troops attacked, ibid. he retreats to Breſlau, ibid. where he is defeated and taken, 370, aſſiſts in driving the Swedes out of the Pruſſian territories, 416
Bienfaiſant French man of war, taken, 390
Birch, ſerjeant, expelled the houſe of commons, 217
Biron, duc de, conveys the young chevalier to Vincennes, 279
———, count, objections againſt electing a duke of Courland during his life, 405
Black friars, reſolutions taken for building a bridge at, 425 mr. Mylne's plan for, preferred, 470, inſcription on the foundation of, ibid.
Blair, Janet, her great age, 425
Blakeney, general, remonſtrates concerning the ſtate of St. Philip's caſtle, 322, his defence and ſurrender of that fort, 325, he arrives in England, and is created an Iriſh lord, 326
Blandford man of war taken by the French, and returned, 317
Bligh, general, commands the land-forces in the expedition againſt Cherbourg, 384, his operations in the neighbourhood of St. Maloes, 385, his rear-guard attacked at St. Caſs, 386, &c.
Blond, French frigate, taken, 471
Boles, captain, his bravery, 372
Bolingbroke, his intrigues at the prince's court, 273
Bolton, D. of, diſmiſſed from his regiment, 221
Bombardments, reflections on, 427
Bombay deſcribed, 303
Bompart, M. makes an unſucceſsful attempt to relieve Gaudaloupe, 435
Bond, Dennis, eſq. expelled the houſe of commons, 217
Boſcawen, admiral, ſent to the Eaſt-Indies, 270, his operations there, 271, ſent with a fleet to North-America, 311, account of his expedition, ibid. he is appointed a commiſſioner of the admiralty, 348, ſails for North-America, 383, aſſiſts in the reduction of Cape-Briton, 389, returns to England, 392, he receives the thanks of the houſe of commons, 422, defeats M. de la Clue's ſquadron, 427, &c. is driven from the French coaſt by bad weather, 472, his operations in the bay of Quiberon, 477
Bougainville, M. de, detached to watch general Wolfe's motions, 441, makes an unſucceſsful attempt to re-enforce Montcalm, 442, and to relieve Quebeck, ibid.
Bouquet, colonel, aſſiſts in the expedition againſt Fort du Queſne, 391
Boyd, mr. his hazardous attempt to reach admiral Byng's fleet, 324
Boys, commodore, watches the armament of M. Thurot, 428, who eludes him, 429, he is obliged to put in at Leith, for proviſions, ibid.
Braddock, general, his unfortunate expedition, 312, &c.
Bradſhaw, captain, relieves a diſtreſſed crew at ſea, 425
Bradſtreet, colonel, re-enforces the garriſon of Oſwego, 315, repulſes a body of French on the river Onondago, 329, aſſiſt in the attempt upon Ticonderoga,, 391, takes and deſtroys Fort Frontenac, ibid.
Bray, captain, his gallant exploit with a French privateer, 382,
Bremen taken by the French, 363, evacuated, 376
Brereton, major, his gallant behaviour at Madras, 443, his unſucceſsful attac upon Wandewaſh, 444, his bravery and death there, 446
———, captain, wounded, 445
Breſlau taken by the Auſtrians, 370, recovered by the Pruſſians, 371
Brew, mr. his laudable behaviour at Anamaboe, 354
Brian, mr. an Iriſh mariner, his reſolution, 472
Briſſac, duc de, routed at Coveldt, 449
Briſtol, riot at, 297
Britiſh fiſhery erected, 282, laws for the improvement of, 341
———, Muſeum erected, 296
———, ſubjects ordered to quit France, or inliſt in the army, 223, broad bottom miniſtry, 255
Broderick, admiral, his ſhip burnt at ſea, 383, and he narrowly eſcapes, ibid. he aſſiſts in the defeat of M. de la Clue's ſquadron, 427
Broglio, mareſchal, eſcapes in his ſhirt from his quarters, 223, and as a courier from Prague, 245, aſſiſts in paſſing the Weſer, 362, and taking Minden, ibid, enters Bremen, 396, which is evacuated, ibid. he defeats the prince of Yſembourg at Sangerſhauſen, 398, manages the artillery at Landwernhagen, 399, defeats prince Ferdinand at Bergen, 447, his progreſs in the dominions of Hanover, 448, commands a ſeparate corps near Minden, ibid. attacs the left of the allies at the battle of Minden, ibid. ſuperſedes Contades and d'Etrées in the command of the army, 449, attempts prince Ferdinand's camp, 450, 480, ſkirmiſhes between his troops and the allies, ibid. exactions by his officers in Weſtphalia, 481, a detachment of his forces worſted at Vacha, ibid. ſituation of his army, ibid. a ſmall corps of it routed near Butzbach, ibid. he is abandoned by the Wirtemberg troops, ibid. ſmall ſkirmiſhes between his troops and the allies, ibid. a detachment of his army victorious at Corbach, 482, and routed at Exdorff, ibid. and Warbourg, ibid. more ſkirmiſhes between his troops and the allies, 483, &c. detachment of his army worſts the hereditary prince at Rhynberg and Campen, 484, more ſkirmiſhes between his detachments and thoſe of the allies, with various ſucceſs, ibid.
Bromley, mr. moves to repeal the ſeptennial act, 221
Brown, count, ſurpriſes don Carlos at Velletri, 254, penetrates into Provence, 266, fights the king of Pruſſia at Lowoſchutz, 335, attempts a junction with the Saxon army, ibid, he and prince Charles of Lorrain defeated near Prague, 358, in which they are beſieged, 359, his death, 361
——, general, veſted with the command of a Ruſſian army againſt the Pruſſians, 400, joined by general Fermer on the borders of Sileſia, ibid. obtains a paſſport from the Pruſſian general to remove for the cure of his wounds received at Zorndorf, 401, he is a native of Scotland, ibid.
Bruhl, count, his lady arreſted, and ordered to leave Saxony, 357
Brunſwick Wolfenbuttel Bevern, Charles duke of, furniſhes troops to the allied army, 361, his territories poſſeſſed by the French, 363, with whom he concludes a treaty, 395, he expoſtulates with his brother Ferdinand, concerning the hereditary prince, ibid. means found to reconcile him to their proceedings, 396, arret of the evangelical body at Ratiſbon in his favour, with the emperor's anſwer, 453. See Ferdinand.
———, Charles-William Ferdinand, hereditary prince of, diſtinguiſhes himſelf at Haſtenbeck, 362, reduces Hoya and Minden, 397, conducts the front at Creveldt, ibid. ſecures the paſs at Wachendonk, 398, his progreſs, ibid. 447, 448, he defeats the duke de Briſſac at Coveldt, 449, paſſes the Weſer in purſuit of the French, ibid. beats up the quarters of the duke of Wirtemberg at Fulda, ibid. detached with a reinforcement to the king of Pruſſia, 450, rejoins the allied army, 481, makes an incurſion into the county of Fulda, ibid. is worſted at Corbach, 482, he retrieves his honour at Exdorf, ibid. his bravery and ſucceſs at Warbour, ibid. he beats up the quarters of a French detachment at Zierenberg, 483, he marches to the Lower Rhine, ibid. is worſted at Rhynberg and Campen, 484, repaſſes the Rhine, ibid. attempt againſt him defeated, ibid.
———, Francis prince of, killed at Hochkirchen, 298
——, Louis prince of, appointed tutor to the prince of Orange, and captain-general of the United-Provinces, 423, memorial delivered by him on the part of the kings of Great-Britain and Pruſſia, 453, declaration delivered to him in anſwer thereto 480
Buccow, general, forced to abandon the ſiege of Koningſgratz, 400
Buckebourg, count of, taken into Britiſh pay for the defence of Hanover, 376, his behaviour at Minden, 448, 449, arret of the evangelical body at Ratiſbon in his favour, with the emperor's anſwer, 453
Buckle, captain, takes the Glorioſo, 270
Bulow, major, ſurpriſes a French party at Marpurg and Butzbach, but is worſted at Munden, 483, and at Schaken. 484

Burnaby, mr. his remonſtrance to the magiſtrates of Fribourg, 278
Burnet, captain, aſſiſts in taking Guadaloupe, 432
Burton, colonel, commands the right wing at Quebeck, 474
Buſbugdia ſurrendered to admiral Watſon and colonel Clive, 331
Buſſy, M. de, recalled from Hanover, 311, taken priſoner in the Eaſt-Indies, 446
Butter allowed to be imported from Ireland into England, 415
Byng, admiral, ſent on a cruiſe to intercept de la Mothe, 312, he ſails for the Mediterranean, 322, arrives at Gibraltar, ibid. his letter to the admiralty from that place, ibid. ſails from thence, ibid. falls in with the French fleet, ibid. his engagement with them, 323, he returns to Gibraltar, ibid. fate of his letter, giving an account of the engagement, ibid. animoſity fomented againſt him, ibid. he is ſuperſeded, and ſent home a priſoner, ibid. meſſage from the admiralty to the houſe of commons concerning him, 339. His trial, 346, he is recommended to mercy, ibid. proceedings in parliament relating to him, ibid. he is executed, 347, paper delivered by him to the marſhal of the admiralty, ibid. remarks on his fate, ibid.
Byron, captain, deſtroys a French fleet, and the town of Chaleurs, 476

C.

Cabinet-council; detrimental to the public for affairs paſſing through the cabinet-council, 10
Cadogan, major-general, appointed colonel of the ſecond regiment of foot guards, 12, ſent as plenipotentiary to Antwerp, about the barrier-treaty, 13, his proceedings againſt the rebels in Scotland, 49, &c. created baron of Reading, 69, negotiates a treaty between England and the duke of Orleans, 72, a cenſure deſigned to be paſſed upon him, 85, made general of the forces in England, 98, ſent embaſſador to the Hague, 99, created an earl, 107, made maſter-general of the ordnance, 169
Cambray; a congreſs there, 144, the ſole mediation there offered to K. George, who refuſes it, 189
Cammock, a Spaniſh rear-admiral, 110, &c. gets into Meſſina, 113, account of him, 124, his romantic offers to admiral Byng, ibid.
Carlos, don, a marriage concluded between him and one of the duke of Orleans's daughters, 179, ſhe is ſent bac, 189, a match deſigned between the emperor's eldeſt daughter and him, 190, the ſucceſſion to Tuſcany preſerved to him, 203
Carnwath, Robert Dalziel E. of, takes arms for the pretender, 35, his character, 37, taken priſoner at Preſton, 44, brought up to London and examined, 48, committed to the Tower, ibid. impeached, 58, brought to the bar of the houſe of lords, and pleads guilty, 59, condemned, ibid. reſpited, 60
Carolina Wilhelmina, princeſs of Wales, delivered of prince William, 164, and of the princeſs Louiſa, 187
Carpenter, general, made commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, governor of Minorca, 70
Carteret, John lord, made one of the lords of the bed-chamber, 12, his ſpeech about the ſeptennial bill, 64, about a ſtanding army, 105, embaſſador and plenipotentiary to Sweden, 123, concludes an alliance between England and Sweden, 144, made ſecretary of ſtate, 163, motion for his private inſtructions to be laid before the parliament, 166, appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 183
Catalans; the lords of the regency write to the king of France in their behalf, 6
Catharine, empreſs of Ruſſia, her anſwer to K. George's letter to her, 195, dies, 202
Chancery, maſters in, their affair, 432
Cholmondely, Hugh E. of, received with great favour by K. George, 8, appointed treaſurer of the houſhold, 11, his ſpeech in parliament, 118
———, George E. of, his ſpeech upon the ſeptennial bill, 64
Clarke, dr. Samuel, publiſhes his Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, 15, lays a paper before the convocation to vindicate himſelf, ibid.
Clement XI. pope, dies, 164, was a great friend to the pretender, ibid.
Committee of ſecrecy choſen, 19, meets, 20, their report, 23, their report concerning mr. Prior, 29, a ſelect one to inſpect into the execution of the South-Sea ſcheme, 152, their report, 155, &c. of the houſe of commons examines Layer, 174, their report, ibid.
Commons, houſe of, debates about K. George's proclamation for calling a new parliament, 19, on the bill for ſeptennial parliaments, 66, &c. meaſures taken by them for reducing the public debts, 86, &c. debates there about the repeal of the ſchiſm and occaſional bills, 117, and about the South-Sea ſcheme, 138, their proceedings about the South-Sea affair, 151, &c. their reſolutions about the South-Sea directors, 155, &c. in favour of the ſufferers by the South-Sea ſcheme, 159, &c. they preſent an addreſs to the king, demonſtrating the neceſſity and wiſdom of their proceedings, 159, debates there about the ſubſidy to Sweden, 161, and about the navy debt, 165, their votes againſt the Oſtend Eaſt-India company, 178, their proceedings againſt the maſters in chancery, 185
Compton, Spencer, choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, 17
Congreſs at Abo and Aland between the Swediſh and Ruſſian miniſters, 93, 142, at Brunſwick and Cambray, 144
Conſpiracy in England, 29, diſcovered, 31, carried on, 34, another conſpiracy, 73
Convocation, after a prorogation by a royal writ, meets, 15
Corporation-act repealed, 117, &c.
Cowper, William, made lord-chancellor, 10, lord high-ſteward at the time of the condemnation of the ſeven impeached lords, 59, and of the E. of Wintoun, 61, his ſpeech on the ſeptennial bill, 65, appointed lord high-ſteward at the E. of Oxford's trial, 94, reſigns the great-ſeal, 107, created an earl, ibid. is againſt the repeal of the ſchiſm-act, 118, his ſpeeches, about the peerage-bill, 122, 136, and about the South-Sea ſcheme, 138, was againſt ſecuring Knight, 153, dies, 181, his character, ibid.
Craggs, James, returns to England with letters to the lords-juſtices, 5, made ſecretary at war, 84, made ſecretary of ſtate, 107, his anſwer to the marquis de Monteleon's letter, 115, gives the houſe of commons an account of the meaſures purſued by the king, 117, was to have been created a peer, 137, challenges the houſe of commons, 152, dies, 154
Czar, Peter I. had taken from the K. of Sweden his German dominions, 72, angry with K. George, 73, 77, &c. miſunderſtanding between him and the court of Hanover, 93, goes to France, and concludes a treaty with that court, ibid. ravages part of Sweden, 124, his miniſter's ſecretary committed, 135, alliance between England and Sweden againſt him, 140, continues the war, and makes a peace without any mediator, 141, refuſes the mediation of England, 143, peace between him and Sweden, 163, his memorial upon mr. Beſtuget's being ordered to leave England, ibid. dies, 194
Caillaud, major, incommodes Lally in the ſiege of Madras, 443
Calcutta, deſcribed, 304, account of its being taken by the viceroy of Bengal, 330, and of its reduction by admiral Watſon and colonel Clive, 354
Calendar altered, 288
Calicut, in the Eaſt-Indies, deſcribed, 303
Cambric, an act concerning, 418
Cambridge univerſity, the duke of Newcaſtle elected chancellor of, in preference to the prince of Wales, 277
Cameron of Lochiel, his caſtle plundered and deſtroyed, 263, he eſcapes to France, ibid.
———, dr. Archibald, taken and executed, 296
———, Daniel, his great age, 425
Campbell, colonel, re-enforces the D. of Cumberland, 262
———, captain, aſſiſts in taking Senegal, 389
Canada, total reduction of, 476
Canning, Elizabeth, her remarkable ſtory, &c. 296
Cape-Breton taken, 257, its importance, ibid. reſtored to France, 272, account of the conqueſt of, 389, the colours taken there exhibited at London, and depoſited in St. Paul's cathedral, 390, the fortifications of its capital demoliſhed, 476
Cape-Coaſt-caſtle in Africa, an attempt on baffled, 353, 354
Capricieux, French man of war, deſtroyed, 390
Carangoly taken by colonel Coote, 446
Carical taken by the Britiſh forces, 477
Carkett, lieutenant, his bravery, 383
Carlos. See Charles.
Carlos, don, takes poſſeſſion of Parma, 214, proclaimed king of Naples, 223, declares war againſt the queen of Hungary, 257, ſurpriſed at Velletri, ibid.
Carlton, colonel, ſecures the weſtern point of the iſle of Orleans, 438, diſlodges a party of the French at Point-au-Tremble, 439
Carolina, North and South, deſcribed, 307
Caroline, queen, her death, 229

Carrickfergus, the ſiege of it, 471, account of M. Thurot's deſcent at, ibid.
Carteret, lord, his goverment in Ireland, 211, his motion and ſpeech concerning Porteus's murder, 227, his remarks on the convention with Spain, 233, and ſpeech on the Daniſh ſubſidy, ibid. motion againſt ſir Robert Walpole, 238, appointed ſecretary of ſtate, 243, oppoſes the indemnifying of the evidences againſt the earl of Orford, ibid. ſent embaſſador to the Hague, 246, attends the king to Germany, 248, becomes E. of Granville, 255
Carwar, in the Eaſt-Indies, deſcribed, 303
Carysfort, lord, preſents a bill for the uniformity of weights and meaſures, 464
Catawbas, Indians, their reſidence, 307, they eſpouſe the Britiſh intereſt, 370
Cathcart, lord, embarks for the Weſt-Indies, 236, his death, 238
Cattle allowed to be imported into England from Ireland, 417
Caylus, marquis de, his proceedings with regard to the neutral iſlands, 278
Cayugas, Indians, make a treaty with the Britiſh colonies, 435
Celebre, French man of war, deſtroyed, 390
Centaur, French man of war, taken, 427
Chabot, count de, ſurrenders Hoya, 396
Charing-croſs, an act paſſed for widening the ſtreet from it to Weſtminſter-hall, 339
Charitable corporation, an account of, 216
Charles, king of Sicily and Naples, enters into a defenſive alliance with France, Spain, Sardinia, &c. 280, and another with the emperor, the kings of Spain and Sardinia, and the duke of Parma, 292, ſucceeds to the Spaniſh monarchy by the title of Charles II. king of Spain, 455, remarkable ſettlement by him touching the ſucceſſion to the Spaniſh and Sicilian dominions, ibid. his wiſe conduct, 458
——, archduke of Auſtria, reſents the treaty of Seville, 213, treaty between him and George II. at Vienna, 214, league againſt him by the kings of France, Spain, and Sardinia, 220, preliminaries between him and France, 225, his death, 236
——, king of Sardinia, effects a match between his eldeſt ſon and one of the infantas of Spain, and engages in a defenſive alliance with France, Spain, &c, 280, accedes to the treaty concluded at Madrid, between the emperor, king of Spain, &c, 292
——, prince of Lorrain, defeated at Czaſlaw, 244, harraſſes Maillebois in his retreat, 245, defeats the Bavarians at Braunau, 248, paſſes the Rhine, 254, defeated at Striegan and Sohr, 256, and at Roucoux, 265, defeated near Prague, 359, in which he is beſieged, ibid. harraſſes the rear of the beſiegers in their retreat, 361
Charles-Town, in South-Carolina, deſcribed, 308
Chedworth, John Howe, created lord, 238
Chelſea penſioners, a bill in behalf of, 309
Cherbourg, the expedition againſt, 384, the artillery taken there expoſed at London, 387
Cherokee-Indians, where ſettled, 307, they eſpouſe the Britiſh intereſt, 330, a body of them join the Engliſh forces, 352, new treaty with them, 472, they recommence hoſtilities, ibid. their towns and villages deſtroyed by col. Montgomery, 473, they take Fort Loudoun, ibid.
Cheſterfield, Stanhope earl of, ſent embaſſador to the Hague, 208, reſigns his office of lord-ſteward of the houſhold, 220, his ſpeech on the play-houſe bill, 228, and againſt the Hanoverian mercenaries, 247, he oppoſes the repeal of the gin-act, 248, and the continuation of the penalties of treaſon, 252, declared lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 256, reſigns the place of ſecretary of ſtate, 271
Chevalier de St. George ſecures Thompſon, warehouſekeeper to the charitable corporation, 216, proclaimed king in ſeveral parts of Scotland and England, 259, 260
—— de St. George the younger, his character, 251, arrives in France, ibid. preparations in England againſt his intended attempt, ibid. correſpondence with him or his brother enacted treaſon, 252, he embarks for Scotland, 258, where he is joined by ſeveral of the natives, ibid. takes poſſeſſion of Edinburgh, 259, gains the battle of Preſton-Pans, ibid. reduces Carliſle, 260, penetrates as far as Derby, ibid. which occaſions a general conſternation at London, 261, his retreat to Scotland, ibid. the progreſs of his followers during his expedition into England, ibid. inveſts the caſtle of Stirling, ibid. worſts Hawley at Falkirk, ibid, takes Inverneſs, 262, defeated at Culloden, 263, his magnanimity, and the fidelity the Scotch to him in his ſubſequent ſituation, ibid. purſued in his return to France, ibid. arreſted at Paris, 279, received with great honours at Avignon, ibid.
Chevert, M. ſent under M. d'Etrées into Germany, 356, aſſiſts in paſſing the Weſer, 362, and in taking Minden, ibid. defeated by general Imhoff at Meer, 398
Chevreuſe, duke of, takes poſſeſſion of Hanover as governor, 368
Cholmondely, brigadier, his behaviour at Falkirk, 261
Chugnuts, their treaty with the Britiſh colonies, 435
Clark, colonel, his information concerning Rochefort, 349
Clavering, colonel, attends general Hopſon to the Weſt-Indies, 431, his operations at Guadaloupe, 434, &c. ſent expreſs to England, 435
Clements, captain, aſſiſts in defeating M. Thurot, 471, honours conferred on him for that exploit, ibid.
Clermont, count de, ſuperſedes the duc de Richlieu, 396, finds the troops in a deplorable condition, ibid. he abandons Hanover, ibid. retreats to the Rhine, ibid. his army harraſſed in their march, 397, he is re-enforced, 376, detaches a corps under the count de St. Germain, ibid. which is defeated at Crevelt, 397, he is ſucceeded in command by M. de Contades, 398
Cleves, the duchy of, taken by the French for the empreſs-queen, 357, 367
Clive, colonel, his firſt exploits in the Eaſt-Indies, 305, &c. he viſits England, 330, aſſiſts at the reduction of Geriah, 331, ſome more of his operations, ibid. he aſſiſts in retaking Calcutta, 354, defeats the nabob of Bengal, ibid. co-operates with the admirals Watſon and Pococke in the reduction of Chandernagore, ibid. worſts the nabob a ſecond time, and concurs in depoſing him, 355, his meaſures to defeat the Dutch hoſtilities in the river of Bengal, 445
Cloſter-Seven, the convention of, 363, diſputes concerning it, 395, diſapproved both by the courts of London and Verſailles, 373
Clue, M. de la, his ſquadron defeated by admiral Boſcawen, 427, his leg broke, ibid.
Cobham, baron of, diſmiſſed from his regiment, 221, reſtored to his office, 255
Coigny, mareſchal de, defeats the Auſtrians at Parma, 223
Coke, lord (earl of Leiceſter's ſon) ſupports the miniſterial proceedings concerning the Weſtminſter election, 288, his motion againſt mr. Murray, 290
Colberg, an attempt upon by the Ruſſians, miſcarries, 404 inveſted by ſea and land, 488
Colby, captain, aſſiſts in taking the Arethuſa, 426
Cole, colonel, covers the retreat of colonel Williams's detachment at lake George, 314
Collingwood, captain, engages two French frigates, and takes one of them, 426
Cologn, Clement Auguſtus elector of, concludes a ſubſidiary treaty with England, 284, which he renounces, 290, proteſts againſt electing the archduke Joſeph king of the Romans, 293, eſpouſes the French intereſt, 316, his remonſtrance to the diet at Ratiſbon concerning the behaviour of the Pruſſians, 489, mutual recrimination between him and the elector of Hanover, ibid.
Colville, lord, commodore at Halifax, 473, ſails to the river St. Laurence, 475 Commons. See Parliamentary Affairs.
——, houſe of, in Ireland. See Ireland.
Como, ſignor, the Parmeſan reſident, ordered to quit England, 210
Condates, M. de, ſent under M. d'Etrées into Germany, 356, takes poſſeſſion of Heſſe-Caſſel, 363, ſucceeds the count de Clermont in the command in Germany, 398, ſends a re-enforcement to the prince de Soubiſe, ibid. penetrates into Weſtphalia, 399, is defeated at Minden, 448, letters to him from the duc de Belliſle, 449, M. d'Etrées joined in command with him, ibid. they are ſuperſeded by mareſchal Broglio, ibid.
Confederates, conquerors at Dettingen, 249, engage the Spaniards at Campo-Santo, 250, routed at Fontenoy, 257, Roucoux, 265, and at Laffeldt, 268
Conflans, M. de, gets the command of a French fleet, 428, with which he ſails from Breſt, ibid. and is defeated by ſir Edward Hawke, ibid. &c. his letter to the ſecretary of the marine concerning his defeat, 429
——, marquis de, defeated by colonel Forde, 444
Conjeveram taken by the Engliſh, 444, repoſſeſſed and abandoned by general Lally, 446
Conoys, Indian, their treaty with the Britiſh colonies, 435
Conqueror man of war loſt, 478
Conſolidation of certain funds, 463

Conſtantinople, ſurpriſing revolution there, 213, diſturbances at, 478
Conſtitutional queries, reſolutions concerning, 287
Continental war; the motives of, 332, reflections on, 337, 375, 339, 375, 376, 377, 406, 408, 413, 458, 465
Contrecœur, M. de, his operation, in North-America, 308
Convention with Spain, 231, petitions againſt it, ibid. ſubſtance of it, 232, debates on it, ibid and 233
Coote, colonel, aſſiſts in the reduction of Calcutta, 354, takes Wandewaſh and Carangoly, makes general Lally quit Conjeveram, and routs him at Wandewaſh, 446, &c. and conquers the province of Arcot, ibid. inveſts Pondicherry, 477, 489, mr. Lally's propoſals to him for the ſurrender of it, ibid.
Cope, captain, his proceedings in the Eaſt-Indies, 243,
Cope, ſir John, defeated at Preſton-pans, 259,
Coppice woods allowed to be converted into paſture of tillage, 338
Corn, an act relating to the bounty on, when exported, 294, riots on account of its high price, 297, 326, 338, 351, bill to prohibit the exportation of, 339, further meaſures taken to remove the dearth of it, 340, enquiry into the cauſes of its ſcarcity 343, regulations with reſpect to the exportation and importation of it, 378, abſurdity of granting a bounty on the exportation of it, ibid. bills relating to the diſtillery and exportation of it, 414, &c. See Diſtillation.
Corniſh, admiral, re-enforces admiral Pococke, 445, reduces Carical, 477, aſſiſts in taking Pondicherry, 490
Cornwall, acts relating to releaſes in, 463
——, captain killed at ſea, 252
Cornwallis, hon. Edward, appointed governor of Nova-Scotia, 278, his proceedings there, 300, embarks with admiral Byng for Minorca, 322
Coromandel coaſt deſcribed, 304
Corporations, bill for quieting, 248
Corſicans, their revolt, 250
Cotes, admiral, ſails for the Weſt-Indies, 351, advices from him, 382, 392, 426
Cotymore, lieutenant, treacherouſly murthered by the indians, 472
Count de St. Florentine French man of war taken, 426
Courland, prince Charles of Saxony, elected duke of, 405
Covent-Garden, fire near, 465
Craven, lord, diſtinguiſhes himſelf in the oppoſition, 211
Crawford, Lindſay, E. of, ſignaliſes himſelf at Crotſka, 234, and at Koucoux, 265
Creek indians, their reſidence, 307
Cromartie, Mackenſie, earl of, joins the young chevalier, 261, taken priſoner in Sutherland, 262, and ſent to London, 263, condemned and reprieved, 264
Crowle, mr. proceedings againſt, 288
Crown-Point fort erected, 299, plan for the reduction of it, 436, with remarks, ibid. taken poſſeſſion of by general Amherſt, ibid.
Crump, colonel, his operations at Guadaloupe, 434, left commander there, 435
Cuddalore taken by general Lally, 393
Cumberland county, riots in, 338
——, D. of ſerves as volunteer with ſir John Norris, 236, wounded at Dettingen, 249, defeated at Fontenoy, 257, reduces Carliſle, 261, aſſumes the command in Scotland, ibid. gains the battle of Culloden, 263, gets an addition of 25,000l. to his former revenue, ibid. takes ſeſſion of Inverneſs, ibid. encamps at Fort Auguſtus, ibid. defeated at Laffeldt, 268, appointed one of the regents, 286, debates thereon, 287, one of the commiſſiones for opening the parliament, 302, and one of the lords of the regency, 311, his inſtructions to general Braddock, 312, and general Foke, 328, urges a deſcent on the French coaſt, 348, takes the command of the allied army, 361, paſſes the Weſer, ibid. is followed by the French, 362, defeated at Haſtenbeck, ibid. he retreats to preſerve the communication with Stade, 363, he is preſſed on all ſides by the French, ibid. and is forced to ſign the convention of Cloſter-Seven, ibid. by which the French are let looſe againſt the king of Pruſſia, 365, remarks on that ſtep, ibid. its conſequences, ibid. he returns to England, and reſigns all his military commands, ibid.
Cumins, ſir Alexander, brings over ſeven indian chiefs to England, 213
Cunningham, colonel, his patriotiſm and gallantry, 322, 325
Cuſtrin, detail of the Ruſſian enormities at, 296
Czarina, Anne, concludes a peace with the Turks, 235, her death, 236 ——, Elizabeth, proclaimed, 241, conſpiracy againſt her, 249, appearance of a rupture between her and Sweden, 479, ſhe is diſſatisfied with the king of Pruſſia's interpoſition, ibid. diſputes between her and Sweden, 284, ſhe takes umbrage at the king of Pruſſia's interpoſing therein, ibid. miſunderſtanding between them, 289, her ſubſidiary treaty with Britain on account of Hanover, 316, ſhe accedes to the defenſive treaty between France and Hungary, 332, her declaration at the Hague, 336, ſhe equips an army and fleet for the aſſiſtance of the Q. of Hungary, 335, her declaration againſt the K. Pruſſia, 357, her anſwer to the Britiſh miniſter, 358, her fleet blocs up the Pruſſian ports in the Baltick, 364, and army take Memel, 365, the Pruſſian declaration concerning her, ibid. her troops are attacked at Norkitten, 367, and make a haſty retreat out of Pruſſia, ibid. ſhe accedes to the treaty between the courts of Vienna, Verſailles, and Stockholm, 374 remarks on her engaging therein, 394, ſhe ſends two armies againſt the K. of Pruſſia, 400, who defeats them at Zorndorf, 401, ſhe expreſſes a great zeal for the intereſts of the Q. of Hungary and K. of Poland, 405, her naval armaments retarded by a fire at Revel, 450, her troops defeat the Pruſſians at Zullichau, 451, and Cunerſdorf, ibid. her anſwer to the Britiſh and Pruſſian memorials, 480, her troops enter Pomerania, 485, which they evacuate, ibid. their motions towards Sileſia, ibid. 486, 487, they make an irruption into Brandenburgh, ibid. and take Berlin, ibid. her forces inveſt Colberg by ſea and land, 488

D.

Dalrymple, ſir David, made auditor of the exchequer in Scotland, 142
Dawes, ſir William biſhop of Cheſter, votes for the E. of Oxford, 27, endeavours to juſtify the univerſity of Oxford, with relation to the riot there, 79, ſpeaks againſt the quaker's bill, and preſents a petition againſt it, 167
Debts; meaſures for reducing the public debts, 86, ſtate of them, ibid. &c. bill for leſſening them, 181, debts of the civil liſt, 186
Denmark, Frederick IV. K. of, the czar's deſigns againſt him, 92, his manifeſto againſt the czar, ibid. treaty between England and Denmark, 142, reſtores all the places taken from Sweden, and make peace, 143, treaty between Denmark, Great-Britain, and France, 200
Derwentwater, James Ratcliffe E. of, engaged in the rebellion, 34, his character, 39, taken priſoner at Preſton, 43, brought up to London, and examined, 48, impeached of high-treaſon, 58, brought to the bar of the houſe of lords, and pleads guilty, 59, his lady intercedes with the king for mercy, 59, petitions the parliament in his behalf, 60, he is executed, and his dying ſpeech, ibid.
Devonſhire, William Cavendiſh E. of, made ſteward of the houſhold, 10, brings in the bill for ſeptennial parliaments, 63, made preſident of the council 69, reſigns his place of preſident of the council, 81, brings about a reconciliation between the king and the prince of Wales, 142, brought again into favour, and made one of the lords-juſtices, ib.
Diſſenters, a deſign to eaſe them, 83, encouraged, 100, get the ſchiſm act repealed, 117, ſome of them make an ill uſe of the indulgence ſhewn to them, 118, a great diſpute among their miniſters, about ſubſcribing articles of peace, 136, an act for exempting the proteſtant diſſenters in Ireland from certain penalties paſſed in the parliament of that kingdom, 135
Dorſet, Lionel Cranfield Sackville D. of, made one of the lords of the bed-chamber, to K. George, 8, and knight of the garter, 12, made a duke, 142
Dubois, abbot, comes to London, 99, helps to diſcover the plot againſt the D. of Orleans, 48
Dumblain, battle of, 44, priſoners taken there, 45, 46
Dunkirk; Prior preſents a memorial about the demolition of it, 13
Dabul in the Eaſt-Indies deſcribed, 303
Dalling, major, his ſtation in the battle of Quebeck, 474
Damien, Robert-Francis, his attempt to to aſſaſſinate the K. of France, 355
Dantzick, ſiege of, 222, refuſes a Ruſſian garriſon 400
Darby, ——, and his two ſons, hanged for murder, 423
Dartmouth, in Nova-Scotia, burned by the Indians, 300
Daſhwood, ſir Francis, his character, 275
——, ſir James, propoſes the repeal of the Jews-act, 301, and ſeconds a motion for repealing a former act in their favour, 302, proceedings on his election for Oxfordſhire, 309, &c.
Daun, count, takes the command of the Auſtrian army, 360, his character, ibid. he routes the king of Pruſſia at Kolin, ibid. &c. defeats the prince of Bevern near Breſlau, 370, takes that town ibid. worſted by the king of Pruſſia at Liſſa, ibid. he arrives at the Auſtrian camp at Koningſgratz, 399, follows his Pruſſian Majeſty into Moravia, ibid, intercepts his convoys, and obliges him to raiſe the ſiege of Olmutz, ibid. remarks on his talents, 400, he is joined by the Imperial army, 402, his motions, ibid. he routes the king of Pruſſia at Hochkirchen, ibid. advances to Dreſden, 403, his meſſage to the Pruſſian governor touching his burning the ſuburbs of that city, ibid. he retires from Dreſden, 404, ſkirmiſhes between his army and the Pruſſians, 450, ſends a re-enforcement to the Ruſſian army before the battle of Cunerſdorf, 451, ſurrounds and takes the Pruſſian army under general Finck, 453, relieves Dreſden, 486, part of his army defeated by the king of Pruſſia, 487, he abandons the blockade of Schweidnitz, ibid. he is dangerouſly wounded and worſted at Torgau, 488, maintains his ground in Saxony, ibid.

Dean, foreſt of, riots in, 338
Deane, captain, his operations in the river St. Laurence, 475, 476
Death, captain, his fate, 375
Debriſay, colonel, blown up at Guadaloupe, 433
Debtors, laws and reflections concerning the impriſonment of, 417, 419. See Impriſonment.
Delaware Indians eſpouſe the Britiſh intereſt, 330, treaty between them and the Britiſh colonies, 435
Delgarno, colonel, appointed commander at Grandterre, 435
Dennis, captain, takes the Raiſonnable man of war, 383
Denmark, Frederick V. king of, his queen dies, 289, he mediates, by his miniſter, the convention of Cloſter-Seven, 363, his miniſter ſeconds the remonſtrances of the French general, concerning the breach of that treaty, 374, his prudent conduct, 407, his patriotic ſchemes, 479
Derwentwater, Ratcliff earl of, enquiry into the ſale of his eſtate, 217
Deſcent. See Expedition.
Deſeada, iſland of, compriſed in the capitulation of Guadaloupe, 435
Deux Ponts, prince de, re-aſſembles the army of the empire, 399, joins general Daun, 401, reduces Koningſtein, and takes poſſeſſion of the ſtrong camp at Pirna, 402, in conjunction with mareſchal Daun defeats the K. of Pruſſia at Hockirchen, ibid. lays ſiege to Leipſick, 403, obliged to retire, 404, ſkirmiſhes between his army and the Pruſſians, 450, he joins general Haddick, who is worſted at Corbitz, 452, a party of his troops checked near Lutzen, 481, action between a body of them and the Pruſſians, 487, he takes Wirtemberg, Torgau, and Leipſick. See Empire.
Devonſhire, duke of, made preſident of the council, 383
Diercke, general defeated and taken by the Auſtrians, 453
Dieſkau, baron, defeated and taken, 314
Dinwiddie, mr. governor of Virginia, his letter to a French commander concerning encroachments upon the Engliſh colonies, 300, gives umbrage to the people of Virginia, 308, makes an alliance with the Cherokees and Catawbas, 330
Diſtillation of ſpirits from grain prohibited for a certain time, 340, 414, arguments for and againſt the diſtillation of malt, ibid. &c. 459, &c.
Dixon, mr. Jeremiah, ſent to obſerve the tranſit of Venus, 457
Dohna, count, aſſembles an army of Pruſſians in Pomerania, 400, meſſages between him and general Fermer, 401, he obliges the Auſtrians to abandon the ſiege of Leipſick, 404, his declarations on entering Poland, 451, he is laid aſide, ibid.
Dogharty, mr. treacherouſly attacked by the Indians, 472
Dolphin, ſhip, deplorable accident on board of, at ſea, 425
Dorſet, Sackville duke of, created lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 211, his government of Ireland, 303
Douglas, general, his conduct at Roucoux, 265
———, ſir James, knighted, 442, operations of his ſquadron at the Leeward Iſlands, 477, 478
Downe, lord, killed at Campen, 484
Draper, colonel, his gallant behaviour at Madras, 241
Dreſden, ſeiſed by the king of Pruſſia, 334, enormities committed there in the royal palace by the Pruſſians, ibid. the ſuburbs of it burnt by the Pruſſian governor, 403, the inhabitants of it grievouſly oppreſſed by that monarch, 404, It is recovered by the Imperial army, 452, an unſucceſsful attempt upon it by the king of Pruſſia, 486
Drucour, M. his defence and ſurrender of Louiſbourg, 638, &c.
Drummond, lord John, joins the young chevalier, 261
———, captain, contributes to the victory of Minden, 449
Dublin, dangerous inſurrections in, 429
Duc d'Aquitaine French Eaſt-India ſhip taken, 351, loſt, 490
Duc de Chartres French Eaſt-India ſhip taken, 426
Duc de Penthievre French Indiaman taken, 351
Duff, captain, aſſiſts in taking a French privateer, 426, cruiſes with a ſquadron on the French coaſt, 428, narrowly eſcapes being taken, ibid.
Dumet, iſland of, taken by lord Howe, 478
Dunbar, col. ſome account of his proceedings in America, 313
Duncannon, viſcount (earl of Beſborough's ſon) appointed a commiſſioner of the treaſury, 348
Dundonald, Cochran earl of, petitions the houſe of lords againſt the election of the Scottiſh peer, 224
Duplex, M. his proceedings in the Eaſt-Indies, 304, 306
Du Queſne, M. defeated and taken by admiral Oſborne, 383. See Fort.
Durell, admiral, ſome of his operations in the river St. Laurence againſt Quebeck, 437, 442, he is thanked by the houſe of commons, 443
Drury, general, killed at St. Cas, 386
Dutch; threatened with a general inundation, 218, ſend troops to England, 262, alarmed at the progreſs of the French in the Netherlands, 264, chooſe the prince of Orange ſtadtholder, &c, 268, enlarge his power, 271, their internal conduct after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 280, an act concerning the Scotch in their ſervice, 258, requiſition of 6000 of their troops made by the Britiſh miniſter, 321, which they declined complying with, ibid. an inſtance of their partiality, 354, they grant the French a free paſſage through their territories, 357, colonel Yorke's memorial to them concerning Oſtend, &c. 372, a great number of their ſhips taken and condemned by the Engliſh, 387, on which their merchants clamour, ibid. and preſent a famous petition to the ſtates, ibid. anſwer to the charge againſt the Engliſh cruiſers, 408, &c. remarks on the Engliſh conduct and their's, 409, conferences between the Britiſh embaſſadors and the ſtates, 395, the management of their princeſs regent, 409, ſubſtance of a letter from the ſtates-general to the ſtates of Holland and Weſt Frieſland, ibid, prince Louis of Brunſwick appointed their captain-general, 423, more of their ſhips taken and condemned by the Engliſh, ibid. 426, they are acknowledged by the French to be the only ſupport of their colonies in the Weſt-Indies, 330, they ſupply the French with proviſions at Guadaloupe, 433, their hoſtilities to the Engliſh in the river of Bengal, 445, &c. they ſend deputies to England, 454, general Yorke's memorial to them, ibid. and count d'Affry's, ibid. they ſupply the French ſettlements in America, 476, mr. Yorke's memorial to them concerning the hoſtilities in Bengal, 749

E.

Eaſt-India company; public debts due to them, 87, an union, propoſed between them and the South-Sea company, 147
Eaſt-India company ſettled at Oſtend, 178, guaranteed by Spain, 189, &c. ſuſpended, 204, ſtopped, 203
Edgcombe, Richard, made one of the lords of the treaſury, 69, removed from his employment, 84, made one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 142, appointed one of the vice-treaſurers of Ireland, 183
Edinburgh-caſtle; ſeveral ſuſpected perſons committed to the caſtle there, 30, plot to ſeize that caſtle, 31, the heads of the diſaffected are ſummoned to come thither, and ſurrender themſelves 35, the rebels march towards that city, 37, ſome miniſters there refuſe to acknowledge K. George, 135
Emperor, Charles, VI. the K. of Spain pretended to have numberleſs complaints againſt him, 72, perſuades the D. of Savoy to take Sardinia in exchange for Sicily, ibid. treaty between him and K. George, 74, attacked by the Spaniards, 99, the courts of England and France try to bring about a reconciliation between him and the K. of Spain, ibid. renounces all pretenſions to the crown of Spain, ibid. quadruple alliance concluded with him, 107, peace concluded between him and the ſultan, 108, writes a gracious letter to admiral Byng, and ſends him his picture, 112, enters into a convention with the D. of Savoy, ibid. ſends to Sicily the troops deſigned for Sardinia, 129, rejects the mediation of the Dutch, 134, continues to take the title of K. of Spain, 141, refuſes the ſole mediation of K. of George, 189, concludes two treaties with Spain, ibid. and a private treaty, 190, had acted with uncommon coldneſs towards K. George, ibid. denies him the inveſtiture of Bremen and Verden, ibid. and 192, complains that the court of Great-Britain and France had endeavoured to ſtir up the Othoman Porte againſt him, 200, prepares to attac the Dutch, in the Netherlands, 202, concludes a peace with Great-Britain, ibid. ratifies the preliminaries, 203

England guarantee of, the neutrality of Italy, 99, the Spaniſh ſquadron ſails for England, 120, peace concluded between England and Sweden, 123
Engliſh too jealous of their liberty to ſuffer foreign forces, 10
Erneſt, biſhop of Oſnabrug, created E. of Ulſter, and D. of York and Albany, 69
Evans, George, created baron Carbery, 10
Eugene, prince, of Savoy, defeats the Turks, 98
Exeter; diſputes there about the trinity, 136
Eyles, ſir John, his ſpeech at the general court of the South-Sea company, 161
——, Francis, expelled the houſe of commons, 154
Earthquakes, an account of two at London, 284, the effects of the prediction of a third by a crazy ſoldier, ibid. a dreadful one at Liſbon, 318, ſeveral in Syria, 474
Eaſt-Frieſland, diſpute concerning, between the king of Pruſſia and elector of Hanover, 292, 297, it is invaded by the French, 362
Eaſt-India company, their charter prolonged, 213, 251, obtain new privileges, 282, the mutiny act extended to their ſettlements, 302, an account of their factories along the coaſt of Malabar and Coromandel, 303, convention between them and the French company, 306, violated by them both, 330, they are enabled to maintain a military force in their ſettlements, 339, the bravery of three of their captains, 351, further ſums granted for the defence of their ſettlements, 414, hoſtilities between them and the Dutch, 445, &c. and accommodation, 446, further grants for their ſettlements, 458
Eaſt-Indies, tranſactions in, 303, 330, 354, 392, 443, 477, 489
Eaſtwood, captain, his ſucceſs, 426
Echo French ſhip of war taken, 285
Edgecumbe, captain, re-enforces admiral Byng, 322
Edinburgh, a bill againſt it, 227, an act for the improvement, &c. of, 294
Edmonſon, Mary, hanged, 424
Edward, captain, his ſucceſs, 426
Effingham (Howard) E. of, embarks with admiral Byng for Minorca, 322
Egmont (Percival) E. of, his character, 273, his motion concerning the negotiation of peace, 277, his remarks on the king's ſpeech, 285, he oppoſes the general naturalization bill, 287, and the court motion concerning the election for Weſtminſter, 392, 395, his exceptions to the addreſs to the king, 397, his motion concerning the mutiny bill, ibid. his proceedings on the bill for the naturalization of the Jews, 294, he oppoſes the extenſion of the mutiny act to the Eaſt-India company's ſettlements, 302
Elcho, lord, joins the chevalier, 262
Elections, acts for regulating, 379, &c. 462
Elizabeth Caroline, princeſs, her death and character, 210
Elliot, mr. appointed a lord of the admiralty, 341, he urges the convenience of a militia in Scotland, 460
——, captain, aſſiſts in taking the Mignonne, 426, and M. Thurot's ſquadron, 472, honours conferred on him for that exploit, ibid.
Elliot, colonel bravery of his regiment at Exdorff, 482
Embden, Eaſt-India company eſtabliſhed, 280, the town of, ſeiſed by the French, 356, 362, the town is evacuated by the French, 383, and its country, 397
Emeraude French man of war taken, 375
Emperor. See Francis, Hungary.
Empire, army of the, raiſed, 365, many of its troops unwilling to ſerve againſt the king of Pruſſia, ibid. aſſembles under the prince of Saxe-Hildburghauſen, 367, joins the French under the prince of Soubiſe, 368, they retreat before the king of Pruſſia, ibid. take Gotha, Erfurth, and Weiner, ibid. re-enforced by general Laudhon, they march to Weiſſenfells in Thuringia, ibid. they are defeated by the king of Pruſſia at Roſbach, 369, it is diſperſed, 370, re-aſſembles near Bamberg in Franconia under the prince de Deux-Points, 399, joins the Auſtrians, 401, reduce Koningſtein, and take poſſeſſion of the ſtrong camp at Pirna, ibid. in conjunction with the Auſtrians, defeat the K. of Pruſſia at Hochkirchen, 402, attempt the ſiege of Leipſick, 403, but forced to abandon it, 404, part of attacked by the Pruſſians at Aſch, 450, retires before prince Henry of Pruſſia, ibid. a body of, defeated near Hoff, ibid. takes Leipſick, Torgau, and Dreſden, 452, joins general Haddick, and is worſted at Corbitz, ibid. part of it checked near Lutzen, 481, action between a part of it and the corps under general Hulſen, 487, Wirtemberg, Torgau, and Leipzig, taken by them and the Auſtrians, 488, it retires into Franconia, ibid.
Enormities, account of ſome prevalent in England, 280, 288, 422. See Murders, Riots
Enterprenent French man of war deſtroyed, 390
Erfurth taken by the French and Imperialiſts, 368
Erſkine, captain, attacs the Glorioſo, 270
Eſſex man of war loſt, 429
Etrées M. d', ſent with a French army into Germany, 356, follows the D. of Cumberland over the Weſer, 362, lays the electorate of Hanover under contribution, ibid. worſts the D. of Cumberland at Haſtenbeck, ibid, is ſuperſeded by the D. of Richelieu, 363, joined in command with M. Contades, 449, ſuperſeded by M. Broglio, ibid.
Etreil, M. d', his defence and ſurrender of Gaudaloupe, 433, &c.
Evangelical body, arret of, in favour of Brandenbourg, Hanover, &c. with the emperor's anſwer, 453
Eugene, prince of Savoy, his death, 226
Exciſe ſcheme, proceedings on, 218, 219, law enacted concerning ſummons by the commiſſioners of, 418
Expedition againſt Rochefort and the iſle of Aix, 349, againſt St. Maloes, 384, 385, Cherbourg, 384, Senegal, 388, Goree, 389, 392, Cape-Breton, 389, Martinique, 431, &c. Gaudaloupe, 432, &c. Quebeck, 437, &c.
Expeditions, reflection on, 386

F.

Falmouth, Hugh Boſcawen, lord viſcount, made one of the Treaſurers of Ireland, 183
Fellows, ſir John, ſub-governor of the South-Sea company, 147, ordered to be taken into cuſtody, 154
Finch, Daniel lord, made one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber to the prince of Wales, 8, impeaches the E. of Carnwarth, 58, removed from the place of one of the lords of the treaſury, 60, his ſpeech in parliament, 83, his ſpeech in behalf of the L. Bolingbroke, 186
Fleet; a fleet ſent into the Baltic, 84, 92, the king's meſſage about the fleet, 106, a ſtrong fleet fitted out by England, 107, the Spaniſh fleet ſails to Sicil, ibid. Engliſh fleet ſent to the Mediterranean, 100. See Byng. They defeat the Spaniſh fleet, ibid. the Spaniſh fleet ſails for England, 120, but is diſperſed, 121, an Engliſh fleet ſent to the Baltick, 124, 143, joins the Swediſh fleet, 144, the Ruſſian fleet lands a body of men near Uma, ibid.
Fonterabia and Fort-Paſſage taken by the French, 133
Forfeited eſtates, 97, bill for veſting them in truſtees, to be ſold for the uſe of the public, ibid.
France; the court of France acknowledges K. George for king of Great-Britain, 6, 7, declares was againſt Spain, 120, four Engliſh gentlemen murdered in France, 181, perſecution there, 184, treaty between France, England, and Pruſſia, 190, and Sweden and Denmark, 200
Frederick IV. king of Denmark, his manifeſto againſt the czar, 93, makes preparations againſt Sweden, but at length agrees to a peace, 224, 142
Frederick, prince of Heſſe-Caſſel, elected K. of Sweden, 144
Frederick, prince, inoculated for the ſmall-pox, 138
Frederickſtadt, the K. of Sweden killed before that place, 93
French deſtroy the Engliſh ſugar-iſlands, 3, debate in the houſe of lords about their buying ſhips in England, 167
Fulham, act for building a bridge between that town and Putney, 194
Fund-act, 90, aggragate ſinking and South-Sea funds, 201
Faidy, John, appointed director and receiver of the revenues of Hanover, 394
Falkner, captain, takes the duc de Chartres, a French Eaſt-India ſhip, 426
Farquhar, colonel, aſſiſts in taking Louiſbourg, 390, in defeating the French at Niagara, 437
Ferdinand VI. ſucceeds to the throne of Spain, 267, joins in a defenſive league with France, Sardinia, &c. 280, his meaſures for cultivating the arts of peace, ibid. 285, 292, he concludes a treaty with England, 285, debates thereon, ibid. joins in a defenſive treaty with the emperor, the kings of Sardinia and Sicily, and duke of Parma, 292, his conduct to England, 309, 317, 318, neutrality of his coaſts violated by admiral Oſborne's ſquadron, 383, his embaſſador's effects plundered by Engliſh privateers, 387, his death, 455
——, don, nominated K. of Naples by his father, ibid.
——, prince of Pruſſia, wounded at Prague, 359
——, prince of Brunſwick, takes poſſeſſion of Leipſick for the K. of Pruſſia, 334, conducts a Pruſſian army into Bohemia, 358, his behaviour in the battle near Prague, 359, and at Kolin, 361, ſent to defend Halberſtadt, 368, from whence he is obliged to retire, ibid. appointed commander of the allied army 373, duke de Richlieu's expoſtulations with him, 374, his anſwer, ibid. his proceedings upon aſſembling the allied army, ibid. he is checked at Zell, and obliged to retire, ibid. he detains his brother's ſon and troops, 395, his brother's expoſtulations with him on that tranſaction, ibid. he takes poſſeſſion of Bremen, Verden, &c. 396, and detaches parties after the French, ibid. he paſſes the Rhine, 397, defeats a detachment of the French at Crevelt, ibid. reduces Duſſeldorp, 398, he reſolves to retreat, ibid. repaſſes the Rhine, ibid. is re-enforced by the Britiſh troops under the duke of Marlborough, ibid. retires to Munſter, 399, is worſted at Bergin, 447, a Britiſh inſpector-general ſent to him meets with a cold reception, 448, cauſe of his animoſity to lord George Sackville, ibid. he defeats the French at Minden, ibid. his orders after that action, ibid. he marches in purſuit of the French, 449, who make an attempt upon his camp, 450, retires to Marpug, ibid. he worſts a French detachment at Dillembourg, 480, receives a re-enforcement of Britiſh troops, 481, defeats the French at Warbourg, 482, miſcarries in an attempt upon Gottingen, 284

Fermer, general, gets the command of a Ruſſian army againſt the Pruſſians, 400, takes poſſeſſion of Koningſberg, ibid. pillages Pomerania, ibid, is joined by general Brown on the frontiers of Sileſia, ibid. into which he ſends ravaging parties, ibid. he is defeated at Zorndorf, 401, meſſages between him and general Dohna, ibid. he is of Scottiſh extract, ibid.

Ferrers, Shirley, E. apprehended, 468, his trial, ibid. conviction, 469, and execution, ibid.

Fink, general, ſurrounded and taken, with his whole army, by count Daun, 453

Findlater, Ogilvie, E. of, attends the duke of Cumberland to Aberdeen, 262

Fiſher, colonel, routs a body of Hanoverians at Tecklenburgh, 361

Fiſhery, Britiſh, ſcheme for improving, 276, 282, 341

Fiſhing-tackle, the convenience of, on board of ſhips, 426

Fiſhmongers, bills relating to, 380, 462

Fitzroy, colonel, thanked by prince Ferdinand for his behaviour at Minden, 449

Five-Nations, Indian, or Irroquois, their habitation, 307, their former and preſent ſtate, ibid. an Engliſh garriſon among them maſſacreed, 329, they are abandoned to the French, 352

Fleur de Lys, French frigate deſtroyed, 477

Fleury, cardinal, his death, 249

Foley, Thomas, lord, diſtinguiſhes himſelf in the oppoſition, 211

Forbes, Duncan, his activity for the government, 260

——, admiral, his reaſons for not ſigning the warrant for admiral Byng's execution, 346, he is continued a commiſſioner of the admiralty, 348

——, general, detached to fort du Queſne, 389, which he takes poſſeſſion of, 391, and calls it Pitſburg, ibid. he concludes treaties with the Indians, ibid. builds a block-houſe near Lyal Henning, ibid. dies at Philadelphia, ibid.

Ford, colonel, defeats M. Conflans in the Eaſt-Indies, 444, routs the Dutch at Chandernagore and Chinchura, 455

Formidable, French man of war taken, 429

Foreſt, captain Arthur, his bravery and ſucceſs, 382, the overſeer of his plantation murdered by the negroes, 477

Forreſter, captain, engages the Dutch gallantly in the river of Bengal, 445

Forſter, mr. treacherouſly aſſaulted by the Indians, 472

Fort Baye-Verte built, 280, taken by general Monckton, 312

—— Beau Sejour built, 300, taken by general Monckton, and called Fort-Cumberland, 312

—— ſur la Riviere-au-Bœuf built, 300

—— Chignacto built, ibid, taken by major Laurence, ibid.

—— Crown-Point built, 299. See Crown-Point.

—— Cumberland built at Wills's creek, 312

—— Du Queſne founded, 308, ſurrendered to the French, ibid. recovered by general Forbes, 391, called Pitſburg, ibid.

—— Frontenac taken and deſtroyed, ibid.

—— at Lake Erie built, 320

—— Loudoun built, 352, reduced by the Cherokees, 473

—— Niagara built, 300, plan for the reduction of it, 436, with remarks, ibid. it is ſurrendered to ſir William Johnſon, 437

—— Ontario taken and demoliſhed by the French, 329

—— Oſwego deſcribed, 315, neglect in not fortifying it, ibid. reduced and demoliſhed by the French, 329

—— St. David's deſcribed, 304, taken by general Lally, 375

—— St. Laurence, built, 405

—— St. Philip's, ſiege and ſurrender of, 324

—— Ticonderoga, unſucceſsful attempt againſt it, 390, &c. new expedition planned againſt it, 436, with animadverſions, ibid. it is abandoned by the French, and taken poſſeſſion of by general Amherſt, ibid.

—— William-Henry reduced by M. Mantcalm, 352

Foudroyant French man of war taken, 383

Foundling-hoſpital, remarks on, 339, ſcheme in favour of it, 380, reſolutions concerning, 422. See Supplies.

Fouquet, M. de la Mothe, obliges general Jahnus to abandon the country of Glatz, 399, relieves Coſel, 404, is beſieged at Landſhut by general Laudohn, 485

Fowke, general receives two letters from the war-office, 322 he is ſuperſeded for not underſtanding them, 323, his trial, 428, he is diſmiſſed from the ſervice, ibid.

Fox, Henry, eſq. oppoſes the enquiry into the E. of Orford's conduct, 243, the motion for hearing the ſea-officers by counſel, 274, and the general naturalization bill, 283, his behaviour with regard to the Weſtminſter election, 288, he is appointed ſecretary of ſtate, 318, letter to him from M. Rouillé, 320, with his anſwer, ibid. his motion for introducing German troops, 321, he has early notice of the French deſigns againſt Minorca, 344, appointed receiver and pay maſter-general of the army, 348

——, commodore, his ſucceſs, 270, and trial, ibid.

Foy, captain contributes to the victory of Minden, 449

France. See Louis XV.

Franckfort on the Maine ſeized by the French, 447

Francis, D. of Lorraine, marries the archduchеſs, and cedes Lorraine, 226, inveſted with Tuſcany, 229, defeats the Turks at Orſova, 231, elected emperor, 256

——, emperor, treaty concluded between him, the kings of Spain, Sardinia, and Sicily, and the D. of Parma, 292, he concludes a new treaty with France, and claims the aſſiſtance of the Germanick body againſt Pruſſia, 336, obſerves a neutrality, as grand D. of Tuſcany, 357, his anſwer to the arret of the evangelical body at Ratiſbon, 453,

Frankland, commodore, ſent with a ſquadron to the Weſt-Indies, 316

Fraſer, colonel Simon, anecdotes of ſome of his officers, 440, 441, he conducts the left wing at the battle of Quebeck, 474

Frederick, K. of Sweden, appearance of a rupture between him and the czarina, 279, 284, amuſed with the hopes of having Heſſe-Caſſel erected into an electorate, 290, his death, ibid.

——, V. See Denmark

——, III. K. of Pruſſia, invades the Q. of Hungary's dominions, 236, rupture between them, 239, gains the battle of Molwitz and Czaſlaw, 240, 244, concludes a treaty with her at Breſlau, ibid. rupture between him and Hanover, 245, 248, treaty between the emperor and him at Franckfort, 253, he invades Bohemia, 254, defeats the Auſtrians and Saxons at Striegan and Sohr, 256, concludes a treaty with England at Dreſden, ibid. invades Saxony, and defeats the Auſtrians and Saxons at Pirna, ibid. concludes peace with Hungary and Saxony, ibid. his interpoſition in an apparent rupture between Ruſſia and Sweden, 279, his internal meaſures ibid. he gives freſh umbrage to the czarina by his interfering in the diſputes between her and Sweden, 284, oppoſes the election of the archduke to be K. of the Romans, ibid. miſunderſtanding between him and the Czarina, 289, continues oppoſing the election of a king of the Romans, ibid. diſpute between him and the elector of Hanover concerning Eaſt-Frieſland, 292, miſunderſtanding between him and the Britiſh court concerning the ſeiſure of his ſhips, ibid. his improvement of Pomerania, 292, he renders the deſign of electing a king of the Romans abortive, 293, proceedings of the diet of the empire relating to the diſpute between him and the elector of Hanover concerning Eaſt-Frieſland, 297, his ſpirited declaration in conſequence of the treaty between England and Ruſſia, 317, he liſtens to a negotiation with England, ibid. and concludes it, 320, his motives for engaging in the war, 332, meaſures taken by him and the elector of Hanover, 333, the Q. of Hungary endeavours to fruſtrate his deſigns, ibid. his demands of an explanation from that princeſs, ibid. with her anſwer, ibid. he invades Saxony, and publiſhes a manifeſto, 334, he enters Dreſden, and blocs up the K. of Poland and his troops at Pirna, ibid. his behaviour at Dreſden, ibid. he invades Bohemia, and fights count Brown at Lowoſcutz, 335, retreats into Saxony, ibid. the king of Poland's memorial to the ſtates-general concerning his conduct, ibid. imperial decrees publiſhed againſt him, 336, his miniſter ordered to quit Verſailles, ibid. his anſwer to the king of Poland's memorial, ibid. his juſtification of his conduct, ibid. with remarks, 337, his letter to the imperial diet rejected, 338, ſeveral places belonging to him ſeiſed by the French, 356, 357, ſtate of the confederacy againſt him, 356, he is put under the ban of the empire, ibid. precautions taken by him, ibid. his behaviour to ſeveral perſons of rank at Dreſden, 357, ſkirmiſhes between his troops and the Auſtrians on the frontiers of Bohemia, ibid. declaration of the czarina againſt him, ibid. he enters Bohemia, 358, his troops under the prince of Bevern defeat the Auſtrians at Reichenberg, ibid. he gains a complete victory over the Auſtrians near Prague, 358, &c. he inveſts Prague, 359, and bombards it, ibid. he is defeated at Kolin, 360, his letter to the earl Mariſchal of Scotland, 361, he evacuates Bohemia, ibid. the fatal conſequences to him from the duke of Cumberland's meaſures, 364, the French enter his dominions, ibid. his ports in the Baltick blocked up by the Ruſſian fleet, ibid. and his town of Memel taken by their army, 365, his declaration on that occaſion, ibid. many of the imperial army unwilling to ſerve againſt him, ibid. he encamps at Leitmeritz, ibid. he marches into Luſatia, 365, his brother prince William leaves the army in diſguſt, and dies, 366, his army is weakened by ſkirmiſhes and deſertions, ibid. ſkirmiſhes between the Ruſſians and his troops, 367, his general attacs them near Norkitten, ibid. his majeſty dares the Auſtrians to a battle, ibid. he marches againſt the united army of the French and the empire, who upon his approach retreat, 368, he finds an attac upon them impracticable, and retires, ibid. action between his troops and the Auſtrians at Goerlitz, ibid. part of his forces gives a chec to the French in Halberſtadt, ibid. but his general is obliged in his turn to retire, ibid. ſeveral parts of his dominions invaded by the French, Swedes, and Auſtrians, ibid. his queen and family remove from Berlin to Magdebourg, ibid. he ſubjects Leipſick to military execution, ibid. he defeats the French and imperial army at Roſbach, 369, &c. part of his troops defeated at Breſlau, 370, he beats the Auſtrians at Liſſa, ibid. retakes Breſlau, 371, and inveſts Schweidnitz, ibid. becomes maſter of all Sileſia, ibid. the Swedes invade his territories in Pomerania, and publiſh a declaration, ibid. his counter-declaration, ibid. ſucceſs of his troops againſt the Swedes, ibid. his letter to king George II. 372, declaration to his miniſter from the Britiſh court, 373, his ſecond treaty with Britain, 377, he raiſes contributions in Swediſh Pomerania, in Saxony, and Mecklenbourg, 394, remarks on his proceedings, ibid. ſtate of the armies for and againſt him, 394, he retakes Schweidnitz, 399, and ſends detachments into Bohemia and Glatz, ibid. enters Moravia, and inveſts Olmutz, ibid. he is followed by count Daun, ibid. who forces him to raiſe the ſiege of Olmutz, ibid. and to retire into Bohemia, 400, he marches to the Oder, ibid. and defeats the Ruſſians at Zorndorf, 401, meſſages between his commander and general Fermer, ibid. he is ſurpriſed and defeated at Hockirchen, 402, &c. retires to Dobreſchutz, ibid. and thence to Sileſia, 403, his governor of Dreſden deſtroys its ſuburbs, ibid. reflections on that meaſure, ibid. his miniſter's anſwer to the Saxon miniſter's complaints on that outrage, ibid. with remarks, 404, the Ruſſians miſcarry in their attempt upon his town of Colberg, ibid. his ſurpriſing conduct and motions, ibid. he oppreſſes the inhabitants of Saxony, ibid. his further proceedings and declaration with reſpect to that electorate, ibid. with reflections, ibid. his officers oblige the Swedes to relinquiſh Pomerania, 405, his third treaty with Britain, 413, remarks on it, ibid. he receives a reenforcement from the allied army, 450, progreſs of his troops againſt the Swedes, ibid. he ſends a detachment to Gotha, &c. ibid. and a third into Mecklenbourg, ibid. a battalion of his grenadiers made priſoners, ibid. he detaches prince Henry into Bohemia, ibid. and Franconia, ibid. he vindicates his own conduct with reſpect to his priſoners, ibid. his general's declaration on his entering Poland, 451, his troops routed by the Ruſſians at Zullichau, ibid. he takes the command of general Wedel's corps, ibid. is routed at Cunerſdorf, ibid. his two billets to his queen, 452, advantages gained by his forces in Saxony, ibid. his army under general Finck ſurrounded and taken, 453, and that under general Diercke, ibid. memorial delivered in his name at the Hague by duke Louis of Brunſwick, ibid. arret of the evangelical body at Ratiſbon in his favour, with the emperor's anſwer to it, ibid. he employs and intercedes for the earl Mariſchal of Scotland, 464, ſends a letter to king Staniſlaus, 480, anſwer to the memorial delivered in his name at the Hague, ibid. a detachment of his army checs a party of the imperialiſts near Lutzen, 481, his general in Pomerania routed and taken by the Swedes, 485, advantages gained over his troops by the Auſtrians in Saxony, ibid. his forces under general Foquet worſted by general Laudhon, ibid. he makes an unſucceſsful attempt upon Dreſden, 486, and obtains a victory over general Laudhon, 487, worſts general Beck, ibid. raiſes the blockade of Schweidnitz, ibid. an engagement between his general, Hulſen, and a corps of imperialiſts, ibid. his capital of Berlin taken by the Auſtrians and Ruſſians, ibid. his critical ſituation, 488, he attacs count Daun at Torgau, ibid. his intimation to the ſtates of Weſtphalia, 489, memorials againſt him to the diet at Ratiſbon, exhibited by the electors of Cologn and Saxony, and the duke of Mecklenbourg, ibid.

Frederick, prince of Wales, arrives in England, 210, marries the princeſs of Saxegotha, 225, motion for a ſettlement on him, 226, breach between his father and him, ibid. 229, 230, he votes againſt the convention, ibid. heads the oppoſition, 242, reſtored to favour, 243, the difference between his father and him increaſed, and his adherents join the oppoſition in parliament, 253, he is diſappointed in his hopes of being elected chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, 277, is choſen governor of the Britiſh fiſhery, 283, his death and character, 286, his declaration to the chiefs of the oppoſition, 463

French cloths, act for prohibiting the importation of, to the ports of the Levant, 417

—— priſoners in England ſupplied with neceſſaries by private contribution, 443

Fribourg, the magiſtrates of, conſent to the young chevalier's reſiding there, 278

Froſt, a very ſevere one, 235

Frye, colonel, receives the ſubmiſſion of ſeveral French coloniſts, 476

Fuentes, count de, ſent embaſſador to England, 478

Fuller, mr. Roſe, prepares a bill for the puniſhment of governors of plantations, 343

Funds, ſome of them conſolidated, 291, 463

G.

Galway, —— de Revigny, E. of, appointed one of the lords-juſtices in Ireland, 57

Gaſtrel, Francis, biſhop of Cheſter, his ſpeech at biſhop Atterbury's trial, 176

Gaultier, abbot, leaves England, 7

George Lewis, prince of Hanover, account of him, and his character before he aſcended the Britiſh throne, 3, is proclaimed in England, Scotland, and Ireland, 4, receives the news of it with great ſerenity, 8, arrives in England, ibid. makes his public entry, ibid. was a powerful prince, and had on foot a good number of troops, 10, expreſſed at his firſt coming a diſlike of the tories, and his attachment to the whigs, ibid. abſolute maſter in his German dominions, ibid. his declaration in council about toleration, 11, is crowned with great ſolemnity, 12, applies himſelf to get the article of the treaty of Utrecht, relating to Dunkirk, to be put in execution, 13, and to have the faults in the treaty of Spain rectified, ibid. his directions concerning preachers, 15, &c. his proclamation for calling a new parliament objected againſt in the houſe of commons, 19, debates about his civil liſt, 21, the duchies of Bremen and Verden are made over to him, 22, receives ſome intellgence of the rebellion, 28, the E. of Mar's letter to him, 29, &c. great interceſſion uſed with him in favour of the condemned lords, but in vain, 59, his anſwer to the lords addreſs in their favour, 60, the clauſe in the act of ſettlement againſt his going abroad repealed, 69, in what reſpect he was like the D. of Orleans, 73, the K. of Sweden plots to dethrone him, ibid. recommends to the commons the leſſening of the public debts, 85, his anſwer to the czar's memorial, 93, guarantee of the neutrality in Italy, 99, tries to bring about an accommodation between the emperor and the K. of Spain, ibid. difference between him and the prince of Wales, ibid. had, ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne, declared for toleration, 100, 117, conſults the judges about the diſpute between him and the prince, 102, a deſign upon his life by John Shepheard, ibid. publiſhes articles for the regulation and government of the army, 105, mediates a peace between the emperor and the Turks, 108, his meſſage to the commons about declaring war againſt Spain, 119, and to the houſe of lords, ibid. his meſſage to the houſe of lords about the peerage, ibid. refuſes the mediation of the ſtates for a peace between England and Spain, 134, forms a project to take Corunna or Peru, ibid. intercedes for the proteſtants in Germany, 135, his meſſage about the Royal and London aſſurances, 140, the czar's memorial againſt him, 141, reconciliation between him and the prince of Wales, 142, was well ſkilled in negotiations, and looked into every thing himſelf, 144, publiſhes a proclamation againſt the bubbles, 145, expreſſes ſent to haſten his return to England upon the falling of the South-Sea, 150, his anſwer to the commons addreſs about the South-Sea directors, 160, his proclamation about the hell-fire clubs, 161, his directions about the trinity, ibid. his meſſage about the ſubſidy given to Sweden, ibid. and about the debt of the civil liſt, 162, his meſſage to the houſe of lords about the pretender's manifeſto, 173, founds profeſſorſhips of modern hiſtory in the two univerſities, 113, his ſpeech to the commiſſioners of the great ſeal, 185, his meſſage to the commons about the maſters in chancery, ibid. and about the debts of the civil liſt, 186, the ſole mediation at Cambray is offered him, which he refuſes, 189, alarmed at the private treaty between the emperor and Spain, 190, his anſwer to the commons addreſs about the treaty of Hanover, 192, his meſſage to the commons about an extraordinary ſupply, 193, his letter to the czarina, 194, ſets out for his German dominions, is taken ill, dies at Oſnabrug, and is buried at Hanover, 203, 204, his circumſtances and character, ibid.

George Auguſtus, prince, arrives in England, 8, is declared prince of Wales, 11, the tories move to have a hundred thouſand pounds per ann. ſettled upon him, 21, is made guardian of the realm, ibid. takes a progreſs through ſome part of the kingdom, 71, difference between him and the king his father, 99, is ordered to quit St. James's, ibid. not appointed regent, and retires into the country, 123, who promoted this difference, 137, the king is reconciled to him, 142.

Gibraltar; the Spaniards deſire to have it reſtored, 135, Gibraltar and Port-Mahon, report of Spain giving ſome places in Peru in exchange for them, 144, thoſe places abſolutely yielded by Spain to Great-Britain, 163, the reſtitution of them inſiſted upon by Spain, 179, 190, 196, the Spaniards prepare to recover them, 192, 196, they make preparations for the ſiege of Gibraltar, and beſiege it actually, 202, whether there was a promiſe to reſtore it, 197, 198

Gortz, baron, 74, ſeized, ibid. his letters, 75, &c. forms the project of making a peace between Sweden and Ruſſia, 93, his letters publiſhed ibid. carries the K. of Sweden the plan of peace between him and the czar, ibid. had an interview with the czar at Leo, 142, arreſted and put to death, 94

Grafton, Charles Fitz-Roy D. of, appointed one of the lords-juſtices of Ireland, 57, made colonel of the royal regiment of horſe-guards, 71, made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 142, choſen knight of the garter, 164, made lord-chamberlain, 182

Guernſey, Heneage Finch lord, created E. of Aylesford, 12

Guy, Thomas, founds an hoſpital for incurables, 187

Gyllemburg, count, the Swediſh reſident, enters into a conſpiracy to ſet the pretender on the Engliſh throne, 73, ſecured, 74, author of a libel, ibid. ſcheme of his conſpiracy, 75, extracts of his letters, ibid. &c. releaſed, 93

Gabel taken by the Auſtrians, 262

Gage, lord, his remarks on the convention with Spain, 232

——, general, carries off general Braddock, 313, detached to command the army before Niagara, 437, aſſiſts in the reduction of Montreal, 455

Gages, count, his operations in Italy, 254

Galiſoniere, M. de la, conducts the French armament to Minorca, 322, 324, his engagement with admiral Byng, ibid. after which he returns to Minorca, 325, and thence ſails bac to Toulon, ibid.

Gallas, count forbid the court, 270

Game, act concerning, paſſed, 293

Gaming-houſes, acts relating to, 291, 341

Ganjam, in the Eaſt-Indies, deſcribed, 304

Gardener, captain, killed in an engagement with M. du Queſne, 362

Gardiner, colonel, ſlain at Preſton-Pans, 259

Gaſcoyne, ſir Criſp, his noble behaviour as a magiſtrate, 296

Gayton, captain, aſſiſts in taſting Guadaloupe, 432

Geary, admiral, driven with ſir Edward Hawke, by bad weather, into Torbay, 428

Genoa, republic of, enters into a defenſive alliance with France, Spain, Sardinia, and Sicily, 280

Genoeſe expel the Auſtrians, 266, beſieged, 269

——— mariners (two) murder the maſter and crew of an Engliſh veſſel, 424

George II. aſcends the throne, 207, ſtate of the nation then, ibid. characters of his chief miniſters, ibid. debates concerning his civil liſt, ibid. changes and promotions in his miniſtry, 228, gets liberal ſupplies for foreign ſubſidies, 229, declines giving a particular anſwer to the commons addreſs for a diſtinct account of money charged for the ſecurity of trade, ibid. obtains a vote of credit, ibid. debates on his foreign ſubſidies, 210, addreſſed touching the Spaniſh depredations, ibid. obtains a vote of credit for an account of arrears due on the civil-liſt, 211, ſets out for Hanover, to accommodate a difference between it and Pruſſia, ibid. concludes a treaty with France and Spain at Seville, ibid. to which there are objections in the houſe of lords, 212, empowered to prohibit loans to foreign princes, ibid. debates on his foreign ſubſidies, 213, treaty of Vienna between the emperor and him, 214, and between them and the king of Spain, ibid. violent oppoſition to his miniſtry, 215, he ſtrikes mr. Pulteney's name out of the liſt of privy-counſellors, &c. 217, ſets out for Hanover, ibid. receives the inveſtiture of Bremen and Verden, 218, objections againſt an addreſs to him on the ſituation of affairs, ibid. he is addreſſed concerning the Spaniſh depredations, ibid. empowered to augment the forces, 222, enabled to apply a large ſum from the ſinking-fund for the current ſervice, 223, debates on his ſubſidy to Denmark, ibid. viſits Hanover, 224, ſends a fleet to Liſbon, ibid. empowered to borrow from the ſinking-fund, 225, goes to Germany, 226, miſunderſtanding between him and the prince, ibid. gets a grant of one million to redeem South-Sea annuities, 227, breach between him and his ſon, 229, his queen dies, ibid. addreſſed touching the Spaniſh depredations, 230, forbids his ſon's viſitors to appear at court, 231, ſends a fleet to the Mediterranean, ibid. accommodates a difference between Denmark and Hanover, ibid. concludes the convention with Spain, ibid. enabled to provide for his younger children, 233, his meſſage touching a ſubſidy to Denmark, and power to augment the forces, ibid. grants letters of marque againſt Spain, 234, declares war againſt Spain, 235, obtains a vote of credit, ibid. viſits his German dominions, 236, takes a body of Heſſians into Britiſh pay, ibid. diſcontents againſt his miniſtry, 237, demands an extraordinary ſupply, ibid. viſits Hanover, 239, for which he concludes a neutrality, and engages his vote for the elector of Bavaria, 240, his propoſal for a ſubſidy treaty to Sweden rejected, ibid. inactivity of his fleets, 241, changes in his miniſtry, 243, reconciliation between him and his ſon, ibid. he forms an army in Flanders, 245, accommodates a difference between Pruſſia and Hanover, ibid. the Daniſh court refuſes to renew the ſubſidy-treaty, with him, ibid. the attention of his miniſtry turned chiefly on the affairs of the continent, 246, takes a body of Heſſians and Hanoverians into Britiſh pay, ibid. concludes a treaty of mutual defence and guarantee with Pruſſia, ibid. he embarks for Germany, 248, difference between Pruſſia and him as elector of Hanover, ibid. he defeats the French at Dettingen, 249, concludes a treaty with Auſtria and Sardinia at Worms, ibid. declares war againſt France, 252, ſeparate article in the treaty of Hanau, with the emperor, in favour of Hanover, 253, makes alterations in his miniſtry, 256, agrees, in the treaty of Warſaw, to pay an annual ſubſidy to the king of Poland, ibid. viſits Hanover, ibid. convention between him and Pruſſia, ibid. he returns to England, on advice of an inſurrection in Scotland, 258, convulſions in his miniſtry, 263, he gets a vote of credit, 264, fruitleſs conferences between his miniſters, &c. and thoſe of France, at Breda, 267, gets 500,000l. to enable him to proſecute the war with advantage, ibid. congreſs at Aix-la-Chapelle, between his miniſters, &c. and thoſe of France, &c. 271, gets another ſum for the vigorous proſecution of the war, ibid. he ſets out for Germany, ibid. peace concluded between him and the belligerent powers at Aix-la-Chapelle, 272, returns from Hanover, 273, difference between him and his eldeſt ſon widened, ibid. his ſpeech at opening the parliament, ibid. debate on the addreſs to him, 274, ſupplies granted him, ibid. his ſpeech at the cloſe of the ſeſſion, 277, he rejects the addreſs of the univerſity of Oxford, ibid. interpoſes between Ruſſia and Sweden, 279, ſcandalous inſults offered to his ſubjects by the Moors, 280, his ſpeech to the parliament, ibid. ſubject of the debates on the addreſs to him, ibid. ſupplies granted to him, 281, he harangues the parliament, and ſets out for Hanover, 283, interferes in the diſputes between Ruſſia and Sweden, 284, endeavours to get the archduke Joſeph elected king of the Romans, ibid. grants

a ſubſidy to the electors of Bavaria, Mentz, and Cologn, ibid. lends the elector of Saxony money on a mortgage, ibid. concludes a treaty with Spain, 285, his ſpeech to the parliament, ibid. debates on the addreſs to him, ibid. &c. ſupplies granted him, 286, his meſſage to parliament concerning a regency, ibid. his ſpeech at the end of the ſeſſion, 288, he interpoſes in the difference between the czarina and king of Pruſſia, 289, and continues his intrigues for electing a king of the Romans, ibid. grants a ſubſidy to the elector of Saxony, 290, his ſpeech at the opening the ſeſſion of parliament, ibid. ſupplies granted him, 291, motion for an addreſs againſt his ſubſidiary treaties, 292, he prorogues the parliament, ibid. and ſets out for Germany, ibid. diſputes between him and the king of Pruſſia, concerning Eaſt-Frieſland and the capture of ſome Pruſſian ſhips, ibid. he engages in a ſubſidiary treaty with the elector palatine, 293, but is diſappointed in a deſign of getting a king of the Romans elected, ibid. his ſpeech at the meeting of the parliament, ibid. ſupplies granted him, ibid. his harangue at the cloſe of the ſeſſion, 296, proceedings of the diet of the empire in the diſpute between him and the king of Pruſſia, relating to Eaſt-Frieſland, 297, in which he is ſupported by the queen of Hungary, ibid. his quarrel with the city of Munſter, ibid. he opens the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, 301, ſupplies granted him, ibid. his ſpeech before the diſſolution of the parliament, 302, he makes changes in his miniſtry, ibid. harmony reſtored in his family, ibid. he opens the new parliament by commiſſion, ibid. harangues the parliament, 309, ſupplies granted him, ibid. his new ſubſidies to Saxony and Bavaria, in conſideration of Hanover, allowed by parliament, ibid. his meſſage to the commons on an apparent rupture with France, 310, he gets an additional ſupply, ibid. his ſpeech at the end of the ſeſſion, 311, he prepares for war, ibid. motion againſt his going to Hanover, ibid. he nominates a regency, ibid. and ſets out for Germany, ibid. rupture between him and France, 312, he gives orders for making general repriſals on the French, ibid. concludes an extrordinary treaty with Heſſe-Caſſel in defence of Hanover, 316, he returns to England, and enters into a ſubſidiary treaty with Ruſſia for the defence of his German dominions, ibid. he enters into a negotiation with Pruſſia, 317, ſtate of his navy, ibid. his ſpeech to the parliament, 318, and their remarkable addreſſes, ibid. his anſwer to thoſe addreſſes, ibid. alterations in his miniſtry, ibid. he concludes a treaty with Pruſſia, 320, his ſpeech at the end of the ſeſſion, ibid. his miniſter's anſwer to the French ſecretary's letter, ibid. he makes a requiſition of 6000 Dutch troops, 321, which the ſtates decline complying with, ibid. his meſſage to the parliament, ibid. he imports Hanoverians and Heſſians, ibid. his proclamation concerning horſes and cattle in caſe of an invaſion, 326, a mutual declaration of war between him and France, ibid. 327, he receives an addreſs from the city of London on the conduct of his miniſters, ibid. his motives for the war in Germany, 332, meaſures taken by him and the king of Pruſſia, 333, his ſpeech at opening the parliament, 338, his meſſage concerning admiral Byng, 339, ſupplies granted to him, 339, 340, his meſſage concerning the German war, 340, and a farther ſupply, ibid. his harangue at the cloſe of the ſeſſion, 345, petitions from lord Torrington and admiral Byng preſented to him, 346, his meſſage concerning that admiral, ibid. he commands mr. Pitt and mr. Legge to reſign, 348, which occaſions clamours, ibid. and addreſſes to him, ibid. the queen of Hungary's and the czarina's anſwers to the propoſals for reſtoring the tranquillity of Germany, 358, his preparations for the defence of Hanover, 361, publiſhes a manifeſto, ibid. he raiſes an army of Hanoverians, ibid. his electorate laid under contribution, 362, 363, convention for it at Cloſter-Seven, 364, his miniſters quit the Auſtrian dominions, 366, his miniſter's memorial to the Dutch, 372, letter to him from the king of Pruſſia, ibid. his anſwer thereto, 373, his reaſon as elector for taking up arms, ibid. his electoral miniſter diſmiſſed from Vienna, 374, his ſpeech at the opening the ſeſſion of parliament, 375, remarks on it, ibid. ſupplies granted him, ibid. obſervations on them, 376, his meſſage to the commons, 377, confidence repoſed in him with reſpect to the ſalaries of the judges, ibid. his ſecond treaty with Pruſſia, ibid. he cloſes the ſeſſion by commiſſion, 381, makes vigorous preparation, ibid. his daughter, the princeſs Caroline, dies, 382, the adminiſtration of his electorate changed by the French, 394, decree of the Aulick council againſt him as elector, 396, his miniſter's memorial in anſwer thereto, and the parallel publiſhed by the court of France, ibid. his electoral dominions again invaded by the French, 398, his electoral memorial to the diet of the empire, in anſwer to a decree of the Aulick council, 405, his particular reply to the parallel publiſhed by the court of Verſailles, 406, he is alarmed with an invaſion from France, 407, his miniſter's anſwer to the Dutch charge againſt the Britiſh cruiſers, 408, and conference with them on that ſubject, 409, arts and ſciences not munificiently encouraged by him or his miniſters, 411, he opens the ſeſſion of parliament by commiſſion, 412, borrows money as elector of Hanover, ibid. remarks on the ſpeech to parliament, 413, he concludes a third treaty with Pruſſia, ibid. addreſſes of both houſes to him, ibid. reflexions on his Pruſſian alliance, ibid. ſupplies granted him, ibid. meſſages from him to the commons, 414, 422, he cloſes the ſeſſion by commiſſion, ibid. his army ſupplied with recruits by the bounty of ſeveral communities, 423, the death of his daughter, the princeſs of Orange, ibid. and grand-daughter, princeſs Elizabeth Caroline, ibid. his meſſages to the parliament concerning an unexpected invaſion from France, 427, addreſſes by the commons for a monument to general Wolfe, 443, his troops in America and Germany ſupplied with divers neceſſaries by private contributions, ibid. memorial delivered in his name by duke Louis of Brunſwick, 453, arret of the evangelical body at Ratiſbon in his favour, with the emperor's anſwer to it, ibid. his reception of the Dutch deputies, 454, his miniſter's memorial to the ſtates-general, ibid. with the counter-memorial by the French embaſſador, ibid. he opens the ſeſſion of parliament by commiſſion, 456, ſubſtance of the addreſſes of both houſes to him, 457, ſupplies granted him, ibid. with reflections, 458, he is enabled to make leaſes in Cornwall, 463, he cloſes the ſeſſion of parliament by commiſſion, 464, remarks on his miniſtry's neglect of of the ſcope of the war, 465, captures by his and the French cruiſers, 470, he defrays the charge of four aſtronomers to the Eaſt-Indies, 478, ſends an embaſſador extraordinary to Portugal, 479, his miniſter's memorial to the Dutch concerning their hoſtilities in Bengal, ibid. he is offered Breda by the ſtates-general for holding a congreſs, 480, Auſtrian miniſter's anſwer to his memorial delivered at the Hague, by duke Louis of Brunſwick, ibid. his electoral dominions invaded by the French, 483, his memorial to the diet at Ratiſbon concerning his being threatened with the ban of the empire, and the elector of Cologn's conduct, 468, his death, 490, character, ibid. re-capitulation of the principal events of his reign, ibid. lamentation for his death, 491, ſtate of commerce during his reign, ibid. of religion and philoſophy, ibid. of fanaticiſm, ibid. of metaphyſics and medicine, 492, of agriculture, ibid. of mechanics, ibid. of genius, ibid. of muſic, 493, painting, ibid. and ſculpture, ibid. diſpoſition of the forces and navy a little before his death, ibid. &c.

George III. born, 230, an act for the ſettlement of a regency, in caſe of his ſucceeding to the crown in his minority, 287, congratulations on his majority, 424

Georgia, the colony of, ſettled, 217, deſcribed, 308

Geriah, Angria's fort, taken, 332

German officers employed in America, 319

——— war, the motives of, 333, reflections on, 337, 339, 375, 376, 377, 385, 387, 392, 394, 452, 458

Gibbon, mr. a clauſe of his ſpeech, 242

Gibſon, mr. proceedings againſt, 288

Gilchriſt, captain, his ſucceſs, 375, 426, he is diſabled by a grape-ſhot, ibid.

Gin act paſſed, 225, repealed, 247

Gingins, captain, his proceedings in the Eaſt-Indies, 305

Giſors, count de, killed at Crevelt, 397

Giſt, mr. his indirect conduct in America, 300

Glaſgow, magiſtrates of, gets a gratuity of 10,000l. 274

Glatz, reduced by general Laudhon, 485

Glengary's caſtle plundered and deſtroyed, 263

Glover, mr. pleads the cauſe of the London merchants before the commons, 243

Gold coin, order concerning, with remarks, 422

—— plate, dealers in, taxes upon, 418

Gordon, duke of, attends the duke of Cumberland at Aberdeen, 262

———, lord Lewis, defeats Macleod and Culcairn at Inverary, 261

———, admiral, beſieges Dantzick, 222

———, major, re-enforces major Brereton, 444

Gore, captain, killed, 445
Goree, unſucceſsfully attacked, 389, but reduced, 392
Gotha taken by the combined army of France and the empire, 368
Gottingen ſurrendered to the French, 363, evacuated, 396, repoſſeſſed by them, 398, 448, and abandoned, 449, retaken by them, 483
Gower, lord, diſtinguiſhes himſelf againſt the miniſtry, 211, 238, created lord privy-ſeal, 244, 256,
Gramont, counteſs of, a French ſhip of war, taken, 375
Granby, marquis of, (duke of Rutland's ſon) complimented by prince Ferdinand at Minden, 449, conducts the Britiſh cavalry at Warbourg, 482, his account of that action, ibid.
Grant, ſir Archibald, expelled the houſe of commons, 216
———, colonel, killed at fort St. Lazar, 239
———, colonel, defeated and taken near Fort du Queſne, 370
———, general, detached by general Fouquet, 485
Granville (Carteret) earl of, reſigns the ſeals 255, which he re-accepts, and again gives up, 263, his remarks on the bill for the Britiſh fiſhery, 283
Graves, captain, his ſucceſs, 426
Greenwich magazine, act for removing, 461, bill for the more effectual ſecuring the payment of prize-money, &c. to the hoſpital of, 464 ———, man of war taken, 374
Grenville, mr. his motion concerning continental connexions, 251
———, captain, killed at ſea, 270
———, hon. George, oppoſes the reduction of the number of ſeamen, 286, conſtituted treaſurer of the navy, 302, his motions in favour of the ſeamen, 343, 378
———, hon. James, appointed a commiſſioner of the treaſury, 348
———, general, conducts a re-enforcement to the allied army, 383, ſignaliſes himſelf at Corbach, ibid.
Guadaloupe, iſland, deſcribed, 432, an account of the reduction of it by commodore Moore and general Hopſon, ibid.
Gueldres, beſieged by the French, 357, 361, capitulates, 366
Guernſey, lord, oppoſes the extention of the penalties of treaſon, 252

H.

Haliſax, Charles, Montague lord, made one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 11, created E. of Halifax, 12, and knight of garter, ibid. his character of biſhop Burnet, 19, his death and character, 22
Hanmer, ſir Thomas, his ſpeech upon preſenting the civil liſt and lottery bills, 5
Harcourt, ſir Simon, obtains a pardon for lord Bolingbroke, 179
Harley, Robert, goes to wait upon K. George at Greenwich, but is not taken notice of, 8, erects a chamberlain's court in Scotland, 9, attends at the king's coronation, 12, his conduct very extraordinary, 18, takes his ſeat in the houſe of lords, 20, impeached of high-treaſon, 24, his ſpeech in his own defence, 27, he is carried to the Tower, ibid. debate in the houſe of commons on his anſwer, 28, preſents a petition to the houſe of lords, 94, his trial, ibid. he is diſcharged, 96, forbid the court, ibid. excepted out of the act of grace, 97, his ſpeech upon the mutiny-bill, 104, and on the repeal of the ſchiſm-bill, 118, is againſt the peerage-bill, 121, he dies, 183, his character, ibid.
Highlanders in Scotland do not declare themſelves, but provide powder and ball, 17, attempt to ſurprize Edinburgh-Caſtle, 31, cannot be perſuaded to enter England, 41, had been tutored by the E. of Wintoun, and told, that if they entered England, they would be all cut to pieces, or taken and ſold for ſlaves, ibid. diſguſted at being joined with papiſts in Lancaſhire, 42. See Rebels. Act for diſarming them, 187
Hiſtory, modern, profeſſors of it founded, 183
Hoadley, Benjamin, biſhop of Bangor (now of Wincheſter) publiſhes his preſervative and ſermon, 91, repreſentation of the convocation about them, with his anſwer, ibid. &c. his ſpeech in parliament, 118
Hoſier, Francis, ſails with a ſquadron to the Weſt-Indies, 130
Habeas corpus act, proceedings on, 380
Haddick, general, lays Berlin under contribution, 368, undertakes the ſiege of Torgau, 403, which he is forced to abandon, 404, joins the imperial army, and is worſted by the Pruſſians at Corbitz, 452
Haddock, admiral ſent to the Mediterranean, 230, the Spaniſh and French fleets paſs by him unmoleſted, 241
Haines, ——, perpetrates ſeveral murders, but eſcapes, 424
Haldane, colonel, attends general Hopſon to the Weſt-Indies, 431
———, captain, aſſiſts in the reduction of Pondicherry, 489
Haldemane, colonel, detaches to la Galette, 475
Hale, colonel, gratified with preſents for bringing the news of the ſurrender of Quebeck, 442
Halket, ſir Peter, killed, 313
Halifax, Montague, E. of, ſignaliſes himſelf by his oppoſition to the miniſtry, 237, promotes the ſettlement of Nova-Scotia, 277
——— town, in Nova-Scotia, founded, 278
Halſey, captain, hanged for murder, 318
Hamburgh menaced by the French and Auſtrian courts, 366
Hamilton, duke of, petitions the houſe of lords againſt the election of the Scottiſh peers, 224 ———, count, his declaration in name of the Swedes on his invading Pruſſian Pomerania, 371, he is forced to retreat, 353, his progreſs in Pomerania, 405, he throws up his commiſſion, ibid.
———, mr. governor of Pennſylvania, his propoſal for the ſafety of the Britiſh traders on the Ohio, 300, diſagreement between him and the aſſembly, 313, he concludes a treaty with the Delaware Indians, 330, aſſiſts at a treaty with ſeveral tribes of Indians at Eaſton, 435
Handel, George Frederick, his death, 425
Hanover taken by the French, 362, 363, the adminiſtration of it changed by them, 394, the duke de Randan's generous and humane conduct there, 396, it is abandoned by the French, ibid. who enter the dominions of it again, 399, 448, and evacuate them, 549, complaints of its army violating the neutrality of the Dutch territories, 454, its territories repoſſeſſed by the French, 483
Hanoverian forces, debates concerning, 247, 453, brought into England, 321, ſent bac to their own country, 338
Hardwicke, lord, created chancellor, 226, defends the convention with Spain, 233, propoſes the extenſion of the penalties of treaſon, 252, frames the marriage-act, 294, created an earl, 302,
Hardy, ſir Charles, returns from Cape-Breton, 392, driven with admiral Hawke by bad weather into Torbay, 428
Harland, captain, ſent to burn two ſhips off Toulon, 427
Harleian collection of manuſcripts purchaſed by parliament, 296
Harley, lord, earl of Oxford's ſon, his motion concerning the Jews, 301
Harper, Janet, her great age, 425
Harche, general, commands a body of Auſtrians in Sileſia, 402, forms the ſiege of Neiſs, 403, which he is obliged to abandon, 404
Harrington, colonel, Stanhope, created lord, and ſecretary of ſtate, 210, earl and preſident of the council, 243, ſecretary of ſtate, 264
Harriſon, captain, aſſiſts in taking the Arethuſa, 426
Hartington, marquis of, D. of Devonſhire's ſon, his government of Ireland, 320. See Devonſhire.
Harvy, major, ſent to ſummon Niagara, 437
Haviland, colonel, detached againſt the Iſle au Noix, 475, aſſiſts in the reduction of Montreal, 476
Havre-de-Grace bombarded by admiral Rodney, 427
Hawke, ſir Edward, defeats the French at ſea, 270, ſent on a cruiſe, 312, 316, and to ſuperſede adm. Byng, 323, he ſails to Minorca, 325, his operations in the Mediterranean, 326, and expedition againſt Rochefort, 348, he ſails for the bay of Biſcay, 383, diſtreſſes the French marine in Baſque road, and at the iſle of Rhé, 362, ſails with lord Anſon to the bay of Biſcay, 384, blocs up the harbour of Breſt, 428, he is driven by ſtreſs of weather into Torbay, ibid. from whence he ſails, and falls in with M. de Conflans' ſquadron, ibid. over which he obtains a complete victory, 429, he is gratified with a penſion, and his merit approved by the parliament, ibid. his operations in the bay of Quiberon, 477
Hawley, general, worſted at Falkirk, 261
Hay, lord Charles, ſails for America, 351
——, dr. appointed a lord of the admiralty, 348
Hendrick, an Indian chief, killed, 314
Henley, lord, oppoſes a miniſterial motion concerning the Weſtminſter election, 288, appointed lord-keeper, 348, high-ſteward at the trial of E. Ferrers, 468
Henry, prince of Pruſſia, his bravery at the battle of Prague, 359, and Kolin, 361, brings off the rear of the Pruſſians from Litmeritz, 365, is wounded at Roſbach, 370, gets the command of a ſeparate army, 399, is in danger of being ſurrounded, 401, until re-enforced by his brother, ibid. he penetrates into Bohemia, 450, enters Franconia, and obliges the imperial army to retire, ibid. makes a forced march, and ſurpriſes general Vehla, 452, relieves Breſlau, 486

Henſey, dr. Florence, convicted of treaſon, 410, pardoned, ibid.
Heritable juriſdiction, &c. in Scotland aboliſhed, 267
Hernhutters, their tenets, 492
Heros French man of war deſtroyed, 429
Herring fiſhery erected, 282, laws for the improvement of, 341
Hervy, lord vice-chamberlain, ſome account of, 215, called up to the houſe of peers, 222, diveſted of his poſt of privy-ſeal, 248, oppoſes the continuation of the penalties of treaſon, 252
———, captain, re-enforces admiral Byng, 322, deſtroys a French ſhip at Malta, 387
Heſſe-Caſſel, prince of, marries the princeſs Mary, 236, arrives in Scotland, 262
———, Wm. landgrave of, precautions taken by him on his ſon's turning Roman chatholick, 308, his advantageous treaty with Britain, 316, he ſends a body of his troops into England, 321, his territories taken poſſeſſion of by the French, 363, the Swediſh anſwer to his memorial, 372, decree of the Aulick council againſt him, ibid. plan of a treaty propoſed by him to France, 395, remarks on that plan and his conduct, ibid. his intended defection prevented by a new turn of affairs, ibid. his territories evacuated by the French, 397, who re-invade them, 398, he gets a large ſum beſides his ſubſidy from Britain, to ſalicitate his return to his dominions, 414, his capital taken by the French, 447, and evacuated, 449, arret of the evangelical body at Ratiſbon in his favour, with the emperor's anſwer, 453, his death, 480
———, Frederick, ſucceeds to the landgraviate of, 480, exactions in his territories by the French, 481, his capital poſſeſſed by them, 483
Heſſian troops diſputes about, 209, 210, brought into England, 321, bill for quartering them, 341
Hewſon, his conſpiracy at New-York, 241
Highland dreſs aboliſhed, 271
Highlanders, their bravery and loſs at Ticonderoga, 391, a detachment of them ſent to the Weſt-Indies, 431, they aſſiſt in taking Guadaloupe, 433, ſent to North-America, 435, ſome of their feats at Quebeck, 440, 441, 474, La Gallette, 475, Eybach, 480, Warbourg, 482, at Zierenberg, ibid.
High-treaſon, bill enlarged, 252, its penalties prolonged, ibid. its laws enforced in the Highlands, 271
Highways.—See Wheels.
Hill, major, ſignaliſes himſelf at Corbach, 279
Hillſborough, (Hill) earl of, appointed comptroller of the houſhold, 302
Holbourne, admiral, ſent with a ſquadron to North-America, 311, 351, arrives at Hallifax, 352, makes two trips to Louiſbourg, 353, where his fleet ſuffers greatly by a hurricane, ibid. he returns to England, ibid.
Holderneſſe (D'Arcy) E. of, continued ſecretary of ſtate, 302
Holmes, admiral, his engagement with a French ſquadron, 330, he compels the French to evacuate Embden, 383, ſails to Cape-Breton, 437, his operations againſt Quebeck, 440, 441, 442, thanked by the houſe of commons, 443, his conduct and ſucceſs at Jamaica, 477
Holſtein Beck, Frederick, prince of, killed at Prague, 359
Holſtein-Gottorp, George, prince of, his activity at Norkitten, 367, he is ſent to harraſs the Ruſſians, ibid. deſpached to the relief of Pruſſian Pomerania, 371, re-enforces the allied army, 396, his ſtation in the battle of Creveldt, 397, diſlodges a body of the French from Freyinſtenau, 447, his behaviour at Minden approved, 449, he repulſes M. de St. Germain at Erſdorf, 481
Holwell, mr. his defence at Calcutta, and cruel uſage there, 330, 331
Home, E. of, commander of the Glaſgow regiment, 261
Hood, captain, takes the Bellona, 426
Hopſon, general, ſent to North-America, 351, and to the Weſt-Indies, 431, his operations at Martinique, ibid. &c. and at Guadaloupe, 432, where he dies, 433
Horn, count, worſts the French at Eglen, 368
Horn, William-Andrew, detection of a murder committed by him, 465
Hotham, captain, his ſucceſs, 426
Houſes, an additional tax on, 377
How, lord, his death and character, 390
——, lord, his engagement with part of a French ſquadron, 311, ſent in purſuit of a French man of war, 349, reduces the iſle of Aix, ibid. conducts the marine armament ſent againſt St. Maloes, 384, Cherbourg, ibid. and to the neighbourhood of St. Maloes, 385, he patroniſes mr. Irwin in his ſcheme for finding the longitude, 425, his operations in the bay of Quiberon, 478
——, colonel, his operations at Quebeck, 441
Hudſon's-bay, attempt to open the commerce to, 276
Hughes, captain, his ſucceſs, 426, ſails with a ſquadron to re-enforce commodore Moore, 431, returns to England, 435
Hughley reduced by admiral Watſon and colonel Clive, 354
Huguely, in the Eaſt-Indies, deſcribed, 242
Hulſen, general, his operations in Bohemia, 450, he marches with count Dohna into Poland, 451, he engages part of the imperial army, 487, abandons Berlin, ibid. joins the king's army, 488
Hume, captain James, killed in a naval engagement, 383
Hungary, queen of, her dominions invaded by Pruſſia, 236, 239, her territories partitioned by treaty between France and Pruſſia, among Saxony, Bavaria, and Pruſſia, 240, fidelity of her Hungarians, ibid. convention between her and Pruſſia, 244, with the emperor, 248, her dominions invaded by Pruſſia, 254, treaty between her and Saxony, and the young elector of Bavaria, 256, and Pruſſia, ibid. her hereditary dominions ſecured by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 272, oppoſition in the Britiſh parliament to her demand of her arrears, 274, her internal conduct, 280, her declaration concerning the diſputes between Ruſſia and Sweden, 284, propoſals for electing her eldeſt ſon king of the Romans, 284, 289, 293, ſhe ſupports the elector of Hanover's pretenſions to Eaſt-Frieſland, 297, treaty between her and the duke of Modena, ibid. ſhe liſtens to the French propoſals, 316, refuſes auxiliaries to England, 317, treaty between her, France, and Ruſſia, 332, ſhe endeavours to fruſtrate the K. of Pruſſia's deſigns, 335, her anſwer to that prince's demands, ibid. her kingdom of Bohemia invaded by his troops, 335, her army fights the Pruſſian at Lowoſchutz, ibid. ſhe demands from Britain and Holland their ſtipulated ſuccours, 336, two armies ſent to her aſſiſtance by the king of France, 356, one of which ſeiſes ſeveral places belonging to Pruſſia for her uſe, 357, the czarina ſends an army, and equips a fleet, for her aſſiſtance, 356, ſkirmiſhes between her troops and the Pruſſians on the frontiers of Bohemia, 357, her anſwer to the Britiſh propoſals, 358, her kingdom of Bohemia is a ſecond time invaded by the K. of Pruſſia, ibid. her troops defeated at Richenberg, ibid. and near Prague, ibid. &c. but rout the Pruſſians at Kolin, 360, ſhe recalls her miniſters from London, and orders the Britiſh miniſters to quit her dominions, 366, ſhe cuts off the communication between Oſtend, &c. and England, ibid. her reaſons for ſo doing, ibid. ſhe admits French garriſons into Oſtend and Nieuport, ibid. threatens Hamburgh, ibid. receives the revenues of Cleves and la Marcke, 367, her forces defeat the Pruſſians at Goerlitz, 368, and lay Berlin under contribution, ibid. they rout the Pruſſians near Breſlaw, and take ſome places in Sileſia, 370, her kingdom of Bohemia laid under contribution, ibid. her army is defeated at Liſſa, ibid. ſhe loſes Sileſia, 371, diſmiſſes the Hanoverian miniſter, 374, her dominions of Bohemia, Glatz, and Moravia invaded by the Pruſſians, 399, her troops force the K. of Pruſſia to abandon the ſiege of Olmutz, 400, they ſurpriſe and defeat him at Hochkirchen, 402, &c. her reſcript to the ſeveral courts of the empire, 405, the elector of Hanover's memorial to the imperial diet with reſpect to his ſervices to her, ibid. the title of apoſtolical queen conferred upon her by pope Benedict XIV. 406, ſkirmiſhes between her troops and the allies, 450, her dominions of Bohemia invaded by prince Henry of Pruſſia, ibid. altercations between her and the K. of Pruſſia, ibid. part of her army re-enforces the Ruſſians before the battle of Cunerſdorf, 451, her troops worſted at Corbitz, Hyerſwerda and Pretſch, ibid. they ſurround and take the Pruſſian army under general Finck, 453, and that under general Diercke, ibid. her anſwer to the Engliſh and Pruſſian memorial concerning a congreſs, 480, advantages gained by her forces over the Pruſſians in Saxony, 485, they defeat an army of Pruſſians at Landſhut and reduce Glatz, ibid. are worſted at Lignitz, 487, and under general Beck, ibid. they take poſſeſſion of Berlin, ibid. her army defeated at Torgau, 488
Hunger, a deplorable inſtance of at ſea, 425
Hunter, Thomas Orby, eſq. appointed a lord of the admiralty, 348
Huſke, general, his conduct at Falkirk 261
Huchinſonians, their principles, 492
Huzzen, captain, his ſtation at Quebeck, 474

Hynde Cotton, ſir John, his ſpeech on the ſeptennial act, 221, and on the army, 229, accepts a place, 255
Hyndford (Carmichael) E. of mediates the treaty of Breſlau between Pruſſia and Hungary, 244, concludes a treaty for a body of Ruſſians, 250

I.

Jacobites, promote addreſſes for diſſolving the union, 15, carry on their deſigns in Scotland with ſecrecy and order, 28, importune the L. Kenmure to take arms for the pretender, 35, their number increaſes, 70
Janſſen, ſir Theodore, expelled the houſe of commons, and taken into cuſtody, 154, his information before the committee of the houſe of commons, 156, Horatio Walpole and ſir Richard Steele ſpeak in his favour, 159
Jekyll, ſir Joſeph, his ſpeech in favour of the E. of Oxford, 23, 26, and of the D. of Ormond, 24, prepares a bill to attaint ſeveral of the rebels, 59, is one of the ſelect committee for the South-Sea affair, 152, made one of the commiſſioners of the great-ſeal, 188
Jennings, ſir John, made one of the commiſſioners of the admiralty, 11
Jerſey, William Villiers E. of, a warrant iſſued out to apprehend him, 31
Ilay, Archibald Campbell E. of, cauſes K. George to be proclaimed in Scotland, 4, ſaves Inverary from falling into the hands of the rebels, 38, removed from all his employments, 69, made lord privy-ſeal for Scotland, 163
Invaſion; an invaſion deſigned from Sweden, 74, &c.
Ireland, great number of papiſts there to be dreaded, 9, Wood's half-pence coined for that kingdom, and great uneaſineſs about them, 180
Jacobites, their intrigues, 251, 258, &c.
Jahnus, baron takes ſeveral places in Sileſia from the Pruſſians, 367, is driven by M. de la Mothe Fouquet out of Glatz, 399, intercepts the convoy deſigned for the Puſſian army before Olmutz, ibid.
Jamaica, deliberations concerning the ſugar-trade of, 274, enquiry into admiral Knowles's management there, 345, inſurrection of the negroes there, 476, regulations in that iſland, 476
Jamonville, M. put to death, 308
Janſeniſm, diſturbances in France, on account of, 280, 292, 297, 309, 312, 338, 407
Jefferies, lieutenant-colonel, his gallantry in defence of St. Philip's fort, 325
Jekyl, ſir Joſeph, his ſpeech on foreign mercenaries, 210
——, captain, his operations at Guadaloupe, 432
Jenkins, captain, his ear cut off by the Spaniards, 232
Jennings, colonel, his behaviour at Carrickfergus, 471, for which he is thanked by the Iriſh houſe of commons, ibid.
Jeſuits, their eſtates in Portugal ſequeſtered, for a conſpiracy, againſt the king, 156, their army routed at Paraguay, 474
Jews, an act for the naturalization of them paſſed, 294, repealed, 301, motion for repealing a former act in favour of them, ibid.
Ilay (Campbell) E. of, oppoſes the penſion-bill, 214, his ſentiments of Porteous's murder, 227, he defends the convention with Spain, 233, becomes D. of Argyle, 252
Ilcheſter, Stephen Fox, created lord, 238
Imhoff, general, defeats M. de Chevret at Meer, 398, retakes Munſter, 449
Imperialiſts.—See empire,
Impriſonment of debtors, when authoriſed, 420.—See debtors,
Inquiry into the charitable corporation, 216, ſale of the E. of Derwentwater's eſtate, 217, the produce of the directors of the South-Sea eſtates, 219, the election of the Scottiſh peers, 224, E. of Orford's conduct, 243
Invincible man of war loſt, 383
John V. K. of Portugal, his death and character, 285
Johnſon, ſir William, undertakes an expedition againſt Crown-Point, 314, encamps at Lake-George, ibid. where he is attacked by the French, ibid. and entirely defeats them, ibid. he retreats, 315, reward beſtowed upon him ibid. his deputy aſſiſts in effecting an alliance with the Indians, 435, of whom he aſſembles a conſiderable number, 437, he defeats the French near Niagara, and reduces the fortreſs, ibid. remarks on his conduct, ibid. he aſſiſts at the reduction of Montreal, 475, 476
——, mr. murdered, 468
Joſeph, K. of Portugal, his acceſſion, 285, ſome account of his internal conduct, 292, 309, his reſtrictions on the Britiſh commerce, ibid. dreadful earthquake at his capital, 318, attempt againſt his life, 407, neutrality of his coaſts violated by the Engliſh, 427, detection and puniſhment of the conſpirators againſt him, 456, miſunderſtanding between him and the pope, 479, receives ſatisfaction for the inſult of his neutrality, ibid.
——, archduke, ſcheme for electing him king of the Romans, 282, 289, 293
Ireland, diſputes in, concerning prerogative and privilege, 302, which are compoſed, 320, it is threatened with a French invaſion, 428, 429, loyalty of the catholicks there, ibid. dangerous inſurrection on an apprehenſion of an union with Britain, ibid. invaſion there by M. Thurot, 471
Iriſh wool, and woollen yarn, allowed to be imported to England, 294, ſalted beef, pork, and butter allowed to be imported, 459, and cattle and tallow, 417, remarkable adventure of five mariners, 472
Iron, proceedings on the bill for encouraging the importation of, from North-America, 282, 342,
Irroquois.—See Five Nations
Irwin, mr. his ſcheme for finding the longitude at ſea, 425
Judges reflexion on the grant for the augmentation of their ſalaries, 377, proceedings on the bill for augmenting their ſalaries, 419
Juſte, French man of war loſt, 429
Juſtices of the peace, reflections on, 291, 294, 319, 341
Juſtifying proofs, publiſhed by authority at Berlin, 336, 337, remarks on them, ibid.

K.

Kelly, George, alias Johnſon, taken up, 170, burns his papers, ibid. employed in the conſpiracy, 175, bill to inflict pains and penalties on him, ibid.
Kenmure, William Gordon lord viſcount, takes up arms for the pretender, 35, his character, 37, taken priſoner at Preſton, 44, brought to the bar of the houſe of lords, and pleads guilty, 59, condemned, ibid. great interceſſion in his behalf, ibid. executed, 60
Kennet, White, his advertiſements about the biſhop of Bangor's ſermon, 93
Kent, Henry de Grey earl of, made one of the lords of the bedchamber, 12, lord-ſteward of the houſhold, 69
King, ſir Peter, made a congratulatory ſpeech to K. George on his public entry, 8, appointed chief-juſtice of the common-pleas, 15, made ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, lord-keeper, and baron of Ockham, 186
Kingſton, William Pierpoint D. of, appointed keeper of the privy-ſeal, 72
Kinnoul, George Hay lord, engaged in the rebellion, 29, impriſoned, 30
Knight, Robert, caſhier of the South-Sea company, examined by the lords, 153, withdraws out of the kingdom, ibid, proclamation to apprehend him, 154, his books and papers ſecured, and the whole account relating to him, ibid. 155
Keene, ſir Benjamin, his negotiation at Madrid, 285, 309, his memorial there, 317
Keith, veldt-mareſchal, wounded at Oczakow, 229, ſent with an army into Sweden, 249, conducts the Pruſſian army into Bohemia, 335, his gallantry at the battle of Lowoſchutz, ibid. he accompanies the king of Pruſſia a ſecond time into Bohemia, 358, inveſts Prague, 359, oppoſes the king of Pruſſia's attacking count Daun at Kolin, 360, brings off the rear of the Pruſſians after that action, 361, encamps at Leitmeritz, 365, accompanies the king to Erfurth, 368, left commander at Leipzig, 369, detached into Saxony and Bohemia, 370, conducts the firſt column of the Pruſſians into Moravia, 399, appointed to ſuperintend the ſiege of Olmutz, ibid. he brings off the artillery from Olmutz, 400, puts to flight an incommoding Auſtrian party on the hills of Hollitz, ibid. ſuſtains the Auſtrian's chief attac at Hochkirchen, 402, a particular account of his behaviour and death there, ibid.
——, major, ſignalizes himſelf at Eybach, 480
——, mr. ordered to quit Vienna, 366
Kempenfelt, captain, brings a re-enforcement to the garriſon of Madras, 443
Kennedy, captain, his bravery, 471
Keppel, commodore, ſent to demand ſatisfaction of the Algerines, 280, aſſiſts in concluding a treaty with Tripoly and Tunis, 292, detached in purſuit of a French man of war, 349, takes Goree, 392, re-enforces Senegal, ibid.
Kerſin, M. de, his attempt upon Cape-Coaſt-caſtle, 353, his engagement with three Britiſh men of war, 382
Khevenhuller, count, his proceeding in Bavaria, 244, re-enforces prince Charles of Lorraine, 245, concludes a convention between the emperor and Hungary, 248

Kilby, Chriſtopher, his contract for the forces in North-America approved of by the commons, 345
Kilmarnock (Boyd) earl of, joins the young chevalier, 260, taken priſoner, 263, and ſent to London, ibid. tried, ibid. and beheaded, ibid.
King, dr. cloſes the ceremony of the inſtallation of the earl of Weſtmorland, at Oxford, with an elegant oration, 425
——, captain, re-enforced in Oſwego, 315
Kingſley, general, his bravery at Minden, 449
Kingſton, in Jamaica, contentions concerning it and Spaniſh-Town, 345
Kinnoul, Hay, earl of, ſent embaſſador to Portugal, 458
Kirkpatrick, captain, his proceedings in the Eaſt-Indies, 305
Knight, captain, his ſucceſs, 426
Knollis, lieutenant, his bravery and death, 472
Knowles, admiral, his operations in the Weſt-Indies, 250, his trial for miſbehaviour, 251, and ſentence, 339, enquiry into his conduct, as governor of Jamaica, 345, he is detached to take the iſle of Aix, 349, retards the attac, by ſending two ſhips to give chaſe to a French man of war, ibid. he is entruſted with the demolition of the works at Aix, ibid. he objects againſt attempting fort Fouras, 350, a piece of fortification planned by him deſtroyed, 390
Konigſeg, count, aſſiſts the grand duke in defeating the Turks, 231, defeated at Reichenberg, 358

L.

Lambert, ſir John, ordered to be taken into cuſtody, 154
Lamberti, marquis de, the D. of Lorraine's miniſter forbidden the court, and goes to Oxford, 14
Land-forces; debates upon the bill for regulating them, 4
Land-tax bill, debate about the preamble of it, 61
Lanſdown, George Granville lord viſcount, taken into cuſtody, 31
Law, John, account of him, 144, kills Beau Wilſon, ibid. author of the Miſſiſſippi ſcheme, and made comptroller of the finances in France, ibid. comes to England, and pleads his pardon, 165
Lawſon, ſir Gilfrid, his ſpeeches in parliament, 81, 116, made groom of the king's bed-chamber, 142
Layer, Chriſtopher, apprehended, and makes his eſcape, 170, retaken and committed to the Tower, ibid. brought to his trial, and found guilty, 174, reprieved from time to time, ibid. examined by a committee of the houſe of commons, ibid. his trial publiſhed, ibid. report of the committee appointed to examine him, ibid. executed, ib.
Lechmere, Nicholas, received by K. George with particular marks of favour, 8, made ſollicitor-general, 15, impeaches the E. of Derwentwater, 48, chairman of the committee to draw up articles againſt the ſeven impeached lords, ibid. prepares a bill for attainting ſeveral of the rebels, 59, moves for a proclamation, offering a pardon to thoſe that were in arms in Scotland, ibid. moves for a clauſe to exclude penſioners from parliament, 66, made chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter, 94, made attorney-general, 107, quarrel between him and ſir William Thompſon, 138, is one of the ſecret committee, 152
Lede, marquis de, takes Sardinia, 99, lands in Sicily, 110, admiral Byng's letter to him, ibid. advances againſt Melazzo, 113, raiſes ſome regiments in Sicily, 114, account of him, 125, retires to Franca-Villa, ibid. is in the battle there, ibid. makes a ſhew of attacking the Imperialiſts, but fortifies Caſtro Giovane, 130, being hard preſſed by the Imperialiſts, he makes overtures for evacuating Sicily, 131, ſigns conventions for evacuating Sicily and Sardinia, 133
Leeds, Peregrine Oſborne D. of, his proteſts, 138
Leghorn to remain a free port, 107
Leiceſter, John Sidney, E. of, made conſtable of Dover-Caſtle, 98
Levellers in Scotland, 184
Lewis XIV. K. of France, forced to abandon the pretender, 4, promiſes to maintain the Hanoverian ſucceſſion, 6, his anſwer about the Catalans, ibid. and about the demolition of Dunkirk, 13, his diſtinction upon the ſpirit and the letter of treaties, ibid. his death, 30, 54
Lewis XV. K. of France, 57, a marriage concluded between him and the infanta of Spain, 179, he ſends her bac, 188, 189, takes the government into his own hands, 190, marries Mary daughter of K. Staniſlaus, ibid.
Lewis, prince of Aſturias, a marriage agreed on between him and the D. of Orleans's daughter, 179, his father the K. of Spain reſigns his dominions to him, 184, he dies, 188
London, city of, their inſtructions to their repreſentatives, 16, riots and diſorders committed there on the anniverſary of the queen's coronation, and on the D. of Ormond's birth-day, 20, on the king's birth-day, and on the 29th of May, 22, and on the E. of Oxford's commitment, 27
——— aſſurance, 140
Lords, houſe of, debates about the conſpirators, againſt K. William, 23, petition to them in behalf of the condemned lords, 59, make ſome exceptions to the preamble of the land-tax bill, 61, debates about the Oxford riot, 79, &c. differences between them and the commons about the E. of Oxford's trial, 94, &c. debates about the mutiny-bill, 104, &c. and about the repeal of the ſchiſm and occaſional acts, 117, their reſolutions concerning the impriſonment of the barons of the exchequer in Ireland, 137, 138, debates about the South-Sea ſcheme, ibid. their proceedings in the South-ſea affair, and South-ſea directors, 152, &c. complaint in their houſe about Law's coming over, 165, take into conſideration the treaty with Spain, 166, debates about the army, ibid. take into conſideration the treaties of Hanover, and addreſs the king thereupon, 192, &c. great debates on the king's ſpeech, 197
Lovat, Simon Frazer, lord, ſurpriſes Inverneſs for K. George, 47, 51
Lowndes, William, preſents to the houſe of commons ſeveral papers relating to the coins, 101
Lumley, Richard lord, his ſpeech about the reward for apprehending the pretender, 5, made one of the gentlemen of the bed-chamber to the prince of Wales, 8
———, Charles lord, gentleman of the bed-chamber to the prince of Wales, 142
Lyddal, ———, his ſpeech about the ſeptennial bill, 66
La Corne, M. his proceedings in North-America, 300
Lacy, general, conducts an Auſtrian army into Brandenburgh, 487, and takes poſſeſſion of Berlin, ibid.
Laforey, captain, his bravery at Louiſbourg, 390
Lally, general, arrives in the Eaſt-Indies, 393, takes fort St. David, ibid. and Cuddalore, ibid. he miſcarries in an attempt upon the king of Tanjore's capital, ibid. marches into Arcot, ibid. commences the ſiege of Madras, 443, which he is forced to relinquiſh, ibid. his letter to M. de Legret, ibid. he makes an unſucceſsful attempt on Conjeveram, 444, retires with M. D'Apché to the iſland of Mauritius, 445, takes Syringham, 446, recovers Conjeveram, but is obliged to abandon it, ibid. routed by colonel Coote at Wandewaſh, ibid, retreats to Pondicherry, ibid. his letter to M. Raymond, 489
Langdon, captain, his bravery, 382
Laſci, general, his ſucceſs, 231, 240, incommodes the Pruſſians in their retreat from Olmutz, 400
Latham, captain, receives the keys of Chandernagore, 354
Latin tongue laid aſide in law proceedings, 214
Latton, mr. his cruel treatment in Morocco, 280
Laudohn, general, defeats a party of Pruſſians, and joins the combined army of French and Imperialiſts, 368, harraſſes the king of Pruſſia in his retreat from Olmutz, 400, advances to the frontiers of Brandenburgh, 402, incommodes the rear of the Pruſſians, 403, ſkirmiſh between his army and the Pruſſians, 451, he is detached with a re-enforcement to the Ruſſians, ibid. he defeats general Fouquet, and reduces Glatz, 485, undertakes the ſiege of Breſlau, ibid. which he is obliged to abandon, 486, is defeated by the king of Pruſſia, 487, maintains his ground in Sileſia, 488
Laurence, general, defeats the French neutrals, 300, aſſiſts in the reduction of Cape-Breton, 389
———, colonel, detached to the aſſiſtance of Mahommed Ali Khan, 305, takes upon him the command of the Eaſt-India company's troops, ibid. relieves Tiruchirapalli, ibid. obtains ſeveral advantages over the French, 330, his gallant defence of Madras, 443
Learning, perſons eminent for, 492
Lee, commodore, his inactivity, 266
Lee, dr. his character, 273, he oppoſes the court meaſures in the Weſtminſter election, 288
Leeds, riot at, 297
Leeward-iſlands.—See Weſt-Indies
Legge, commodore, intercepts ſeveral French ſhips, 270
——, hon. Henry, appointed chancellor of the exchequer, 302, he oppoſes a clauſe in favour of Hanover, 318, is diveſted of his office, ibid. to which he is reſtored, 348, he is commanded to reſign, ibid. receives honourable teſtimonies of the people's approbation, ibid. replaced in the offices of chancellor of the exchequer, and commiſſioner of the treaſury, ibid.

Legibelli, a Mooriſh king of, ſome account of, 388, 389, 392
Le——, mr. his caſe, 302
Lehwald, mareſchal, his engagement with M. Apraxin, at Norkitten, 367, he forces the Swedes to retire from the Pruſſian territories, 371
Leigh, mr. high-bailiff, his proceedings at the Weſtminſter election, 283, 287
Leipſick taken poſſeſſion of by prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, 334, it is ſubjected to military execution by the Pruſſians, 368, ſiege of, undertaken in vain by the army of France, and the empire, 369, ſubjected again to military execution, 394, inveſted by the prince of Deux-Ponts, 403, the ſiege of it raiſed, 404, it is grievouſly oppreſſed by the king of Pruſſia, 412, reduced by the army of the empire, 452, retaken by the Pruſſians, ibid. recovered by the imperialiſts and Auſtrians, 488, poſſeſſed by the Pruſſians, ibid.
Lendrick, captain, his ſucceſs, 426
Leſlie, captain, aſſiſts in the reduction of Guadaloupe, 432
Leſtock, admiral, his conduct off Toulon, 252, &c. commands an expedition to Britany, 266
Levant.—See Turkey
Levis, chevalier de, undertakes the ſiege of Quebeck, 474, worſts general Murray there, ibid. but is obliged by him to abandon the ſiege with precipitation, 475
Lewis, major, advances againſt the Indians, 473
Licenſes to public houſes, proceedings relative to, 291, 294, 341, 377
Lichfield, tumult at, 277
———, man of war ſhipwrecked, 392
Lichtenſtein, prince, routed at Kolin, 358, his conduct at Kolin applauded by the K. of Pruſſia, 361
Lignitz taken by the Auſtrians, 368
Ligonier, ſir John, ſignaliſes himſelf at Roucoux, 265, taken at Laffeldt, 269
———, captain, complimented by prince Ferdinand for his behaviour at Minden, 449
Lindſay, captain, mortally wounded near Cherbourg, 285
Lobkowitz, prince, his operations, 245, 250, 254
Lockhart, captain his ſucceſs, 351, 375
Logie, captain, aſſiſts in defeating M. Thurot's ſquadron, 471, honours conferred on him for that exploit, ibid.
Logs-town, on the Ohio, ſurpriſed, 308
London, two earthquakes at, 284, peſtilential fever at the ſeſſions-houſe of, ibid. its addreſs to George II. on the critical ſituation of affairs, 327, grants bounties to volunteers, 423, its reſolution for building a bridge at Black-friars, 425, a conflagration at, ibid. preſents an addreſs to the king on the taking Quebeck, 442, and a petition concerning the exceſſive uſe of ſpirituous liquors, 459, bill for improving its ſtreets, 461, and for ſupplying it with fiſh, 462, a fire in its neighbourhood, at Covent-Garden, 465, proceedings of the lord-mayor, &c. concerning the bridge at Black-friars, 470
London-Bridge, act for repairing of, 379, the temporary part of it burnt, 410, further ſums granted towards improving it, 414, 458
Longevity, inſtances of, 425
Longitude, ſcheme for finding it at ſea, ibid.
Loring, captain, his tranſactions on lake Champlain, 436, 437, and lake Ontario, 475
Lorraine, ceded to France, 225
Loudon (Campbell) E. of, his operations in Scotland, 260, 261, appointed commander in chief in North-America, 326, ſtate of affairs on his arrival at New-York, 329, he concerts meaſures for the enſuing campaign, 330, which are obſtructed by diſſentions among the colonies, 352, ſets out for Halifax, ibid. obliged to poſtpone his deſigns againſt Louiſbourg, ibid. remarks on his conduct, 382, he returns to England. 389
Louis XV. king of France, war declared between him and England, 252, defeats the confederates at Fontenoy, Roucoux, and Laffeldt, 257, 265, 268, his navy defeated by the Engliſh, 270, concludes a treaty of peace with England at Aix-la-Chapelle, 272, cenſured for the arreſt of the young chevalier, 270, he mediates a reconciliation between Sweden and Ruſſia, ibid. internal meaſures of his miniſtry, 280, his diſputes with his parliaments concerning the bull Unigenitus, 292, 297, 309, 312, 338, 407, he engages in a defenſive alliance with Spain, Sardinia, &c. 384, interferes in the diſputes between Ruſſia and Sweden, 388, his declaration concerning the propoſed election of the archduke to be king of the Romans, 388, 394, ambitious ſchemes of his ſubjects in North-America, 404, their perfidious practices in Nova-Scotia, 405, he recalls the parliament of Paris from exile, 413, conduct of his miniſter at London, 415, rupture between him and England, 416, the trade of his ſubjects greatly diſtreſſed by the Engliſh, ibid. fruitleſs intrigues of his miniſters in Spain, 421, 422, their practices in Germany, 421, his declaration at the court of Vienna, 422, he refrains from open hoſtilities, ibid. ſtate of his navy, ibid. an act concerning Britiſh ſubjects in his ſervice, 425, his miniſter's letter to mr. Fox, 426, and anſwer thereto, ibid. he threatens Britain with an invaſion, ibid. mutual declarations of war between him and England, 326, 327, cloſe connexion between him and the two empreſſes, 332, his miniſters declaration at Berlin, 333, and to the diet of the empire, 336, he orders the Pruſſian miniſter to leave Verſailles, on the Dauphineſs's miſcarriage, occaſioned by his maſter's treatment of her parents, ibid. he holds a bed of juſtice, 338, an attempt by Damien to aſſaſſinate him, 355, change in his miniſtry, 356, he ſends two armies into Germany, ibid. his miniſter ordered by the king of Pruſſia to quit Dreſden, 357, his generals take poſſeſſion of Hanover, 362, 363, his troops admitted into Oſtend and Nieuport, 366, he menaces Hamburgh, ibid. his miniſter's memorial to the Dutch concerning the Engliſh cruiſers, 387, his views in the German war, 394, he changes the adminiſtration of Hanover, 394, plan of a treaty propoſed to him by the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, 395, his treaty with the duke of Brunſwick Wolfenbuttel, ibid. his memorial called the Parallel, 396, anſwer to it, 406, his troops retreat to the Rhine, 397, they re-enter the territories of Hanover, 399, meaſures taken by his miniſtry for the ſupport of the public credit and trade, to carry on the continental war, to re-enforce his American colonies, and to alarm England with an invaſion, 407, preparations made for that purpoſe, 427, and to invade Ireland, 428, his priſoners in England ſupplied with clothing by private contributions, 443, his miniſters ſtop payment, 454, his envoy's memorial to the Dutch, in anſwer to the Britiſh embaſſador's, ibid. captures by his and the Britiſh cruiſers, 470, 471, his anſwer to the Britiſh and Pruſſian memorial, 480, liſt of his ſhips of war taken, deſtroyed or caſually loſt, ſince the commencement of the war till about the middle of the year, 1760, 494
Louiſbourg, ſurrender of, 390, its fortifications demoliſhed 476
Lovat, lord, eſpouſes the chevalier's cauſe, 260, ſeized and makes his eſcape, 261, his houſe deſtroyed, 263, tryed and beheaded, 264
Lowendahl, count, his progreſs, 268, 269, &c.
Luckner general defeats a French detachment under count Muret, 480, another at Eybach, ibid. raiſes contributions in Fulda, 481, his exploit at Butzbach, ibid. he repulſes ſome French detachments at Eimbeck, Nordheim, and Norten, 483
Lyman, general, his operations in America, 314
Lyme ſhip of war foundered, 478
Lynar, count de, mediates, by the king of Denmark's orders, the convention of Cloſter-Seven, 363, he ſeconds the remonſtrances of the French general on the breach of that treaty, 474
Lys, French man of war, taken, 311
Lyttleton, ſir George, his conduct in parliament, 225, 232, 235, 246, admitted into the treaſury, 255, oppoſes the motion for the ſea-officers being heard by counſel, 274, and that for reducing the number of the ſeamen, 286, ſupports the general naturalization-bill, 287, appointed cofferer of the houſhold, 303, chancellor of the exchequer, and a lord of the treaſury, 460
———, colonel, ſupports the court intereſt in the Weſtminſter election, 288
———, William, Henry eſq. governor of South-Carolina, his treaty with the Cherokee Indians, 472

M.

Macclesfield, Thomas Parker E. of, complaints againſt him, 185, impeached for high crimes and miſdemeanors, 186, his trial, ibid. committed to the Tower, and releaſed upon paying his fine of 30,000l. ibid.
Mackintoſh, brigadier, laird of Borlum, croſſes the Firth of Forth with a body of highlanders, 35, &c. his character, 38, &c. taken priſoner at Preſton, 44, brought up to London, and ſent to Newgate, 48, bill of high-treaſon found againſt him, 62, he makes his eſcape, 67
Malt-tax; riots in Scotland about it, 187, petitions againſt it from ſeveral ſhires, 193
Manifeſto of the pretender's adherents, 31
Mar, John Erſkine E. of, removed from his place of ſecretary of ſtate, 10, had made many profeſſions of loyalty to K. George in a letter, 29, heads the rebellion in Scotland, ibid. ſets up the pretender's ſtandard at Brae-Mar, 30, assumes the title of lieutenant-general of the pretender's forces, and publishes a declaration to exhort the people to take arms, ibid. publishes a manifesto, 31, &c. his men commit great disorders, 38, receives three letters, which had been intercepted by mr. Forster, ibid. &c. two letters of his intercepted, 39, sends a commission to T. Forster to act as general in England, 41, resolves to pass the Forth, and to march into England, 44, engages the D. of Argyle near Dumblain, 45, &c. waits upon the pretender at Feteross, 48, his letter about the pretender's proceedings, 49, &c.

Mardyke, 13, to be demolished, 72, 74
Marischal, George Keith E. of, summoned to surrender himself at Edinburgh, 35, joins the rest of the rebels, 36, waits upon the pretender at Feteross, 48, forms the rear of the rebels in their retreat, 51
Marlborough, (John Churchill,) D. of, invited over by L. Bolingbroke, 8, lands at Dover, ibid. makes a public entry into London, but his coach breaks down, ibid. kindly received by K. George, ibid. made captain-general, master of the ordnance, &c. ibid. his speech about regulating the land-forces, 21, reflected upon on account of the coarseness of the soldiers shirts, and his advertisement and speech thereupon, 23, has the nomination of the officers of the new raised regiments, with the D. of Argyle, and the generals Stanhope and Cadogan, 28, is ill and never perfectly recovers, 71, his death and character, 168
Marseilles; a plague there, 165
Masters in chancery; proceedings against them, 185
Mecklenburgh, D. of, marries the czarina's niece, 92
Memorial of the czar, 93, 141, &c. of colonel Stanhope, 195, of the marquis de Pozzobueno, 198, of mr. Pointz, ibid. of mr. de Palms, 199, of the British and French ministers at the diet of Ratisbon, 200
Mercy, count de, arrives at Naples, an account of him, 124, lands in Sicily, 125, his bravery at the battle of Franca-Villa, ibid. &c. wounded there, 126, struc blind, 128, has a conference with admiral Byng, 130
Messina taken by the Spaniards, 110, the English fleet come thither, ibid. the citadel surrenders, 112, besieged by the imperialists, the city surrenders, 128, &c. the citadel also surrenders, 130
Methuen, Paul, made one of the commissioners of the treasury, 11, one of the principal secretaries of state, 69, resigns his places, 83, 84, made comptroller of the household, 142, made treasurer of the household, 187
Middleton, Alan Broderick lord, lord-chancellor of Ireland, dissents from some resolutions of the house of lords, 137
Ministers, distinction between the king and his ministers, 117
Mint suppressed, 178
Modern history; professors of it founded in our universities, by K. George I. 183
Molesworth, Robert lord, his account of Denmark quoted, 104, envoy to Turin, 142
Montague, Ralph D. of, receives particular marks of favour from K. George, 8, grand-master of the order of the Bath, 187
———, Edward Wortley, made one of the commissioners of the treasury, 11
Monteleone, marquis de, the Spanish embassador in England, 126, his letter to secretary Craggs, 114
Montrose, James Graham, D. of, made secretary of state for Scotland, 10, made lord clerk register of Scotland, 70, and keeper of the great-seal, 72, is for the peerage bill, 122
Moore, Arthur, removed from his place, 10, excepted out of the act of grace, 97
Morpeth, Henry Howard, lord, moves for an address, for reasons why the squadron was sent into the Baltick, 199
Murray, Charles, lord, in the rebellion, 38, his character, ibid. taken prisoner at Preston, 44, ordered to be shot, 48, pardoned, 97
Macbean, capt. contributes to the victory of Minden, 449
M'Cartie, commodore, defeated and taken, 477
Macdonald, captain, his humanity and bravery, 440
———, captain Donald, commands a corps at the battle of Quebeck, 474
M'Ginnes, captain, his bravery and death, 314
Macquire, M. takes Gabel, 365, attacked at Asch, 450, his gallant defence of Dresden, 486
Machault, M. de, removed from his office in the French ministry, 356
Mackenzie, Catharine, her great age, 425
Mackintosh, lady, taken prisoner, and her effects plundered, 263
Maclean, capt. takes a fort at Coucate, in the East-Indies, 444
Macleod (Mackenzie) lord, sent prisoner to London, 363
Macleod, laird of, raises his followers for the government, 260, routed at Inverary, 261
Macnamara, admiral, escorts the French fleet from Brest, 311
Madder, act for encouraging the growth of, 379
Madras, in the East-Indies, taken by the French, 266, described, 304, besieged by general Lally, 443
Magdalen-hospital, the institution of, 411
Maitland, captain, his gallantry in an engagement off Hispaniola, 477
———, captain Richard, reduces Surat, 444
Malabar coast described, 303
Malt, an additional tax on, 458. See Distillation, Corn.
Malta, complaints about the violation of its neutrality by the English, 387, a Turkish ship carried thither, 479
Manchester, riots at, 297, 410
Manners, a satire, proceedings against, 234
Manteuffel, general, his progress against the Swedes, 450, by whom he is defeated and taken, 485
Marchmont (Hume) earl of, his motion, 222, petitions against the elections of the Scottish peers, 224
Marigalante submits to general Barrington, 435
Marine society formed, 226
Marines, act passed for the better regulation on shore, 341
Marischal (Keith) earl, letter to him from the king of Prussia, 361, two acts in his favour, 464
Maritime laws of England extended to America, 320
Mark, county of, seized by the French for the empress-queen, 357, 367
Marlborough, (Churchill) duke of, the death of his duchess, 251
———, (Spenser) duke of, his motions, 222, 238, opposes keeping the Hanoverians in British pay, 251, his motion concerning the constitutional queries, 287, he is appointed one of the commissioners to enquire into the miscarriage against Rochefort, 349, account of his expedition against St. Malo, 384, he is appointed to the command of the British troops in Germany, ibid. joins the allied army, 398, dies at Munster, 399, an account of the transaction between him and mr. Barnard, 412, &c.
Marriage act, an account of, 274
Marsh, captain, commands the squadron sent against Senegal, 388
Marshal, lieutenant, his bravery and death, 392
Martin, captain, wounded, 393
Martinique island, fort of, destroyed by two British men of war, 392, the state of it, 430, and description, 432, an account of the descents upon it by commodore Moore, general Hopson, and general Barrington, 431
Maryland described, 307
Maskelyne, mr. Nevil, sent to observe the transit of Venus, 478
Mason, mr. Charles, sent to observe the transit of Venus, 478
——, major, commander of the marines in the expedition against Senegal, 388
Massachuset's-bay described, 306
Massey, col. assists in defeating the French at Niagara, 437
Masulipatam, in the East-Indies, described, 304, taken by colonel Forde, 444
Mathews, admiral, his conduct in the Mediterranean, 246, 250, 252
——, mr. murdered by Stirn, 471
Maxwell, colonel, bravery of his battalion at Warbourg, 482, at Zierenberg, 483
Meah-Atchund continued governor of Surat, 444
Measures and weights, an enquiry about, 381, 464
Mecklenbourgh-Shwerin, Frederick duke of, joins in the confederacy against Prussia, 356, his dominions laid under contribution by the Prussians, 372, 394, his remonstrance to the diet at Ratisbon, 489
Nedley, admiral, his operations in the Mediterranean, 266, 270
Melampe, French ship of war, 371
Melville, major, assists in taking Guadaloupe, 433, appointed governor of the citadel of Basse-terre, ibid. 435
Memel taken by the Russians, 365
Mentz, John Frederick elector of, concludes a subsidiary-treaty with England, 284, his letter to the king of Prussia concerning the election of the king of the Romans, 289, his minister rejects the king of Prussia's letter to the Imperial diet, 338
Mercer, colonel, left commander at Oswego, 315, killed there, 329
Messina, a great plague there, 250
Methodists, some account of, 492
Meyer, col. destroys the Austrian magazine at Pilsen, 359

Michie, captain Colin, killed, 455
Mignonne, French frigate, taken, 426
Milford-Haven, reſolutions concerning, 341, acts in favour of, 378, 414, 417
Militia-bill, proceedings on, 320, 340, act for explaining it, 378, new laws relating to it, 416, rivals the ſtanding army in military accompliſhments, 422, bill for quickening the execution of the laws concerning it, 464, attempt to eſtabliſh one in Scotland, ibid. further regulations relating to that of England, 481, with reflections, ib.
Millar, captain, aſſiſts in taking Senegal, 388
——, lieutenant, his bravery and ſucceſs, 477
Milne, enſign, his precautions for the ſafety of Fort Prince George, 472
Minden taken by the French, 362, retaken by the Hanoverians, 397, repoſſeſſed by the French, 448, ſurrendered to the allies, 449
Miniſinks, their treaty with the Britiſh colonies, 435
Minorca; preparations againſt, by the French, and neglect of, by the miniſtry, 322, account of the reduction of it, 324, 326, enquiry into the loſs of it, 343, &c.
Mirepoix, duke de, his embarraſſment in his embaſſy at London, 310, his declaration to the Britiſh miniſtry, 311, he is recalled, ibid. and ſets out for Paris without taking leave, 316, his propoſals at the court of London, 326
Mitchel, commodore, his rencounter with Conflans, 246, ſaves Zealand, 268
Modena, Francis III. duke of, extraordinary treaty between, and the court of Vienna, 297
Modeſte, French man of war, taken, 427
Mohair. See Silk, and Turkey Trade.
Mohicons, their treaty with the Britiſh colonies, 435
Mohawks, Indians, their habitation, 307, treaty between the Engliſh governors and them, 435
Monckton, general, ſent with a detachment to Nova-Scotia, 312, his operations there, ibid. appointed to ſerve under general Wolfe againſt Quebeck, 433, diſlodges a body of the enemy from the point of Levi, ibid. his operations at the attac of the entrenchment at Montmorenci, 439, forms a plan for landing the troops near the heighths of Abraham, 441, and aſſiſts in the execution of it, ibid. conducts the right at the battle of Quebeck, ibid. where he is dangerouſly wounded, 442, he receives the thanks of the houſe of commons, 443, goes to New-York, ib.
Monro, ſir Robert, killed at Falkirk, 261
——, of Culcairn, routed at Inverary, ibid.
——, colonel, ſurrenders fort William-Henry, 353
Monſon, major, reduces Carical, 477
Montague, captain, deſtroys the Oriflamme, 383
Montcalm, marquis de, reduces Oſwego, 329, his proceedings in conſequence thereof, 352, he makes an unſucceſsful attempt upon fort William-Henry, ibid. defeats colonel Parker at Ticonderago, ibid. reduces fort William-Henry, 353, his precautions for the defence of Quebeck, 438, repels general Wolfe at Monmorenci, 439, is defeated and ſlain at the battle of Quebeck, 441, 442
Montgomery, colonel, deſtroys the Cherokees' towns and villages, 472, his expedition to the middle ſettlements, 473
Montroſe, duke of, petitions againſt the election of Scotiſh peers, 224
Moore, commodore, commands at the Leeward Iſlands, 426, where he is re-enforced by a ſquadron under captain Hughes, 431, an account of his attempt on Martinique, ibid. and of his operations at Guadaloupe, 432, he ſails to Antigua, 435
——, captain, his ſucceſs, 426
Moravians, their tenets, 492
Mordaunt, ſir John, appointed commander of the land forces ſent againſt Rochefort, 335, enquiry into his conduct, 349, his trial, 351, he is acquitted, ibid. but diſmiſſed the ſervice, ibid. addreſs of the commons concerning him, 380
Morriſon, captain, killed, 473
Morocco, ſcandalous treatment of the Engliſh embaſſador there, 280, and of captain Barton, and his crew, of the Lichfield man of war, 392
Morpeth, lord, his motion, 215
Mortmain, the ſtatute of, altered, 225
Morris, Robert Hunter, his petition concerning making ſalt in America, 381
Mothe, M. de la, ſails to America with a French ſquadron, 311, part of which is taken, ibid. he returns to Breſt, 316, arrives at Louiſbourg, 352
Munich, count, his progreſs, 231, 234, and condemnation, 245
Munſter, diſputes between, and Hanover, 297, ſeized by the French, 448, retaken by the allies, 449
Murder, an act for the prevention of, 292
Murders, an account of ſeveral, 282, 423, &c. 465, 468, 470
Murphy, lieutenant-colonel, killed at Wandewaſh, 446
Murray, lord George, joins the young chevalier, 259
——, lord John, his regiment ſuffers much at Ticonderago, 391, a detachment of it ſent to the Weſt-Indies, 431, they aſſiſt in taking Guadaloupe, 433, 434, ſent to North-America, 435
——, mr. his character, 273, promotes the bill for extending the military laws to the Eaſt-India company's ſettlements, 302, created attorney-general, ibid. lord Mansfield, lord-chief-juſtice of the King's-Bench, and temporary chancellor of the exchequer, 348
——, hon. Alexander, proceedings againſt, 288, proceſſion at his releaſement from Newgate, ibid. animoſity of the commons towards him, 290, proceedings upon a pamphlet entitled his caſe, ibid.
——, hon. general James, nominated to command, under general Wolfe, againſt Quebeck, 438, his operations at the attac of the entrenchments at the river Montmorenci, 439, he is detached up that river, 440, forms a plan for landing the troops near the heighths of Abraham, 441, and aſſiſts in executing it, ibid. conducts the left wing at the battle of Quebeck, ibid. where he acts bravely, ibid. he receives the thanks of the houſe of commons, 443, appointed commander at Quebeck, ibid. his vigilance for the maintenance of that poſt, and the reduction of Canada, 473, his motives for giving battle to the French, 474, by whom he is worſted, ibid. but obliges them to abandon the ſiege of Quebeck with precipitation, 475, he lands at Montreal, 476, publiſhes manifeſtoes among the Canadians, ibid. co-operates in the reduction of Montreal, ibid.
Mutiny-bill, proceedings on, 275, 282, 293, 302, 310, 341
Muy, chevalier de, defeated at Warbourg, 482
Mylne, mr. his plan for the bridge at Black-Friars preferred, 479

N.

Nairn, William Murray, lord, ordered to come and ſurrender himſelf, 35, his character, 38, taken priſoner at Preſton, 44, impeached, 58, brought to the bar of the houſe of lords, pleads guilty, and is condemned, 59, his lady petitions the king for mercy, ibid. reſpited, 60, diſcharged, 97
Naples; the great joy of the inhabitants upon the Engliſh fleet's coming there, 110, the weakneſs of that kingdom, 129
Navy; debates in parliament againſt the navy-debt, 165
Newcaſtle, Thomas Holles Pelham, D. of, his ſpeech in the debates on the ſeptennial bill, 64, made lord-chamberlain, 86, quarrel between the prince of Wales and him, 99, made ſecretary of ſtate, 183
Newton, ſir Iſaac, his repreſentations about coins, 101, his account of Wood's halfpence, 180
Nicholſon, William, biſhop of Carliſle his advertiſement about the biſhop of Bangor's ſermon, 93
Nithiſdale, William Maxwell E. of takes up arms for the pretender, 35, ſummoned to ſurrender himſelf, ibid. taken priſoner at Preſton, 44, brought up to London, examined, and committed to the Tower, 48, impeached, 58, brought to the bar of the houſe of lords, pleads guilty, and is condemned, 59, his lady petitions the king for mercy, ibid. ordered for execution, 60, makes his eſcape, ibid. and 67
Norfolk, Thomas Howard D. of, committed to the Tower, 173, debate about it, ibid. admitted to bail, 179
Norris, ſir John, ſails to the Baltick with a fleet, 21, 74, 92, 124, 143, made one of the commiſſioners of the admiralty, 107, writes to the Ruſſian embaſſadors, 143
North and Grey, William, his ſpeeches about the South-Sea ſcheme, 138, ſeized near the Iſle of Wight, and brought up to London, 170, his houſe ſearched, admitted to bail, 179
Northumberland, George Fitz-Roy D. of, captain of the life-guards, receives K. George I. at his landing, 8, attends him at his public entry, ibid.
Nottingham, (Finch,) E. receives particular marks of favour from K. George, 8, made preſident of the council, 10, a letter of his to the D. of Roxburgh intercepted, 38, 39, is for receiving and reading the petitions of the condemned lords, 60, removed from his place of preſident of the council, ibid. ſpeaks againſt the bill for ſeptennial parliaments, 63, 66, the penſion of 2500l. per annum taken from him, 72, makes a complaint in the houſe againſt the growth of profaneneſs and immorality, 161, thanked by both univerſities, and the clergy, for his anſwer to mr. Whiſton, ibid.

Nabob.—See Eaſt-Indies
Nadaſti, general, takes Schweidnitz, 370
Nairn, lord, joins the young chevalier, 259
Narticoques, Indians, treaty between them and the Britiſh colonies, 435
Narſipore, French factory at, takes captain Knox, 444
National debt, debates on, 209, ſcheme for reducing the intereſt of, 281, ſome articles of, conſolidated, 291, remarks on it, 458
Naturalization of foreign proteſtants, proceedings, on the bill of, 287, and that of the Jews, 294, 301
Navigation, remarks on the freedom of, 408
Navy, plan for manning, 276, 379, 419
Negroes make an inſurrection in Jamaica, 476, &c.
Neutral iſlands, motions concerning, 277, part of them taken poſſeſſion of by the French, 278, and evacuated, ibid.
Newcaſtle, D. of, appointed ſecretary of ſtate, 264, elected chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, 277, preſents a bill for a regency in caſe of a minor king, 286, propoſes the repeal of the act for the naturalization of the Jews, 301, reſigns the ſeals, and is appointed firſt lord of the treaſury, 302, a commiſſioner on that board, 348
Newcaſtleman of war loſt, 490
Newdigate, ſir Roger, his motion touching the repeal of the Jews bill, 301
New-England, a general deſcription of, 307
New-Hampſhire, deſcribed, ibid.
New-Jerſey deſcribed, 307, its governor and deputies, aſſiſt at a grand treaty with the Indians, 435
Newton, major, left commander at Goree, 392
New-York deſcribed, 307, diviſions in it, 308
Niagara fort built, 300, plan for the reduction of it, 436, with remarks, ibid. it is ſurrendered to ſir William Johnſon, 431
Nichols, major, wounded, 314
Nieuport, communication between it and England interrupted, 366, it receives a French garriſon, ibid.
Noailles, mareſchal de, worſted at Dittengen, 249, the ſic and wounded on the field of battle left to his care, ibid.
Norbury, captain, his bravery, 477
Norris, ſir John, ſent to Liſbon, 224, attempts to intercept the Ferrol ſquadron, 336, makes two fruitleſs expeditions towards the Spaniſh coaſt, 241
Nova-Scotia, ſchemes for a ſettlement in, 277, diſputes about its limits, 285, conferences relating to it broke up, 297, deſcription of it, 298, ſhort view of the diſpute concerning its limits, 306 perfidious practices of the French there, 300, from whence they are expelled, 312
N———t, mr. his character, 273
Nugent, mr. appointed a commiſſioner of the treaſury, 348

O.

Occaſional conformity, act repealed, 117
Orford, Edward Ruſſel E. of, received with great favour by K. George, 8, made firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, 11, reſigns that place, 23
Orleans, D. of, made regent of France, 54, reſtores a juſt privilege to the parliament of Paris, 57, reaſons of his acting towards England as he did, ibid. and, 69, ready to contend for the crown of France, 72, concludes a treaty with K. George and Holland, ibid. murmurs in France againſt this treaty, ibid. guarantee of the neutrality of Italy, 99, enters into the quadruple-alliance, 107, Alberoni's plot againſt him, 120, declares war againſt Spain, ibid. offers K. George numerous forces, 121, offers his mediation to Sweden, ibid. gives admiral Byng leave to confiſcate all French ſhips in the ſervice of Spain, 124, refuſes the marquis de Scotti a paſſport, 134, gives K. George I. notice of the plot againſt him, 169, projects a marriage between his daughters and the princes of Spain, 179, dies, 181
Ormond, James Butler D. of, ſends dr. Ratcliffe to attend the queen, 5, not admitted into the king's bed-chamber, 8, diſmiſſed from his office of captain-general, but the king ſends him word, he ſhould be glad to ſee him at court, 10, made one of the privy-council in Ireland, ibid. riots in London on his birth-day, 20, cry of high-church and Ormond, 23, his popular behaviour, 24, &c. attempt upon his ducheſs, ibid. impeached of high-treaſon, ibid. flies out of England, ibid. the articles againſt him, 28, his name and coat of arms razed, and inventories taken of his perſonal eſtate, 29, reſigns the place of chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford, 33, comes towards England, 39, 41, returns from the coaſt of England, 51, 52, 57, bill for attainting him in Ireland, ibid. his letter to baron Gortz, 77, comes to Spain, and ſails with the Spaniſh ſquadron for England, 59, a proclamation againſt him, ibid. concerned in Layer's plot, 174, ſome deſigns formed by his inſtigation in favour of the pretender, 195
Orrery, Charles Boyle E. of, committed to the Tower, 170, admitted to bail, 179
Oſſulſton, Charles Bennet lord, created E. of Tankerville, 12
Oxford; the mayor receives a letter ordering him to proclaim the pretender, 4, riots there, 28, a letter from a a gentleman there to his friend at London, about drinking the pretender's health, 33, debate about the riot there, 80
———, Robert Harley, E. of, goes to wait upon K. George at Greenwich, but is not taken notice of, 8, attends the king's coronation, 12, his conduct very extraordinary, 18, appears unconcerned, and boaſts of the great things he had done for ſecuring the Hanover ſucceſſion, ibid. takes his ſeat in the houſe of lords, 20, his letter to Q. Anne, 23, impeached of high-treaſon, &c. 24, comes to the houſe of peers, and ſoon after retires, ibid. articles of impeachment againſt him, 25, &c. ordered to be committed to ſafe cuſtody, 27, his ſpeech in his own defence, ibid. attended by a mob, ibid. brought to the bar of the houſe, and receives a copy of the articles againſt him, ibid. put a few days in the cuſtody of the blac-rod, ibid. carried to the Tower, 27, additional articles againſt him, 28, debate in the houſe of commons on his anſwer, ibid. preſents a petition to the houſe of lords, 94, his trial, ibid. diſcharged, 96, forbid the court, ibid. excepted out of the act of grace, 97, his ſpeech upon the mutiny-bill, 104, and on the repeal of the ſchiſm-bill, 117, is againſt the peerage-bill, 121, dies, 183, account of him and his family, ibid. &c.
Oberg, general, defeated by the prince of Soubiſe at Landwernhagen, 329
Obrien, captain, his bravery and ſucceſs, 436
Ocean, French man of war, taken, 427
Ochterlony, captain, an affecting anecdote of, &c. 439
Ogilvie, lord, joins the young chevalier, 260
———, counteſs of, arreſted, 357
Ogle, ſir Chaloner, ſent to the Weſt-Indies, 336, joins admiral Vernon, 239
Oglethorpe, general, ſubſtance of one of his ſpeeches, 215, he embarks for Georgia, 217, his operations, 238, 246, 261,
Ohio company, the riſe and conduct of, 299, the Britiſh intereſt eſtabliſhed on the banks of that river, 473
O'Kennedy, colonel, ſurrenders Carangoly, 446
Olmutz inveſted by the king of Pruſſia, 399, ſome account of it, ibid. the ſiege of it raiſed, 400
Oneidos, Indians, conclude a treaty with the Engliſh ſettlements, 435
Onondago river, two forts begun on, 315, taken by the French, 329
Onondaoes, Indians, make a treaty with the Britiſh colonies, 435
Onſlow, Arthur, eſq. choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons 209, 223, 241, 271, 302
Ontario, lake, deſcribed, 315
———, fort, taken by the French, 329
Orange, William-Henry, prince of, marries the princeſs Anne, 222, elected ſtadtholder, 268, 271, his death and character, 289, marriage of his daughter, 480
———, princeſs of, endeavours to adjuſt the difference between England and Holland, 409, her death and character, 402
Orford, (Walpole) E. of, enquiry into his conduct, 243, his death, 256
Oriflamme, French man of war deſtroyed, 383
Orleans, Louis-Philip, D. of, ſerves in Germany under M. d'Etrées, 362
Orphée, a French man of war taken, 38
Oſborn, ſir Danvers, animoſity in New-York concerning his inſtructions, 307
Oſborne, admiral, ſails for the Mediterranean, 351, his ſucceſs, 383, he receives the thanks of the houſe of commons, 422
Oſtend, communication between it and England broke off, 366, it receives a French garriſon, ibid.
——— Eaſt-India company diſſolved, 214
Oſwald, mr. urges the neceſſity of a militia in Scotland, 460
Oſwego deſcribed, 315, neglect in not fortifying it, ibid. reduced and demoliſhed by the French, 329, in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, 391

Ottoman Porte, a man of war belonging, taken, 479
Ourry, captain, deſtroys a French privateer, 478
Oxford univerſity, ſeverities exerciſed upon ſome of its ſtudents, 277, its addreſs rejected, ibid. inſtallation at, 425
Oxfordſhire election, proceedings on, 309

P.

Packington, ſir John, makes a complaint in the houſe of commons againſt dr. Ratcliffe, 5, taken into cuſtody, 29, honourably diſcharged, ibid.
Paget, William lord, created E. of Uxbridge, 12
Palcotti, marquis of, executed for murder, 103
Palms, mr. de, his memorial, 199, cenſured in parliament, ibid. ordered to depart the kingdom, 200
Papiſts, a proclamation for diſarming them in Ireland, 4, and in England, 6, eſpouſe the abdicated family, 8, a tax upon them, 173
Parker, ſir Thomas, one of the lords-juſtices, 4, his ſpeech at the E. of Oxford's trial, 95, made lord-chancellor, 107, See Macclesfield, Parliament; act for ſeptennial parliaments, 63, &c.
Parma, duke of, his memorial at the congreſs of Cambray, 163
—— and Placentia to be ſettled on the Q. of Spain's ſon, 99, 107, 135, the inveſtiture of them granted to him by the emperor, 203
Paſſarowitz; treaty ſigned there, 109
Patten, Robert, his account of the rebellion, and of the heads of it, 37
Paul, William, tried and condemned, 68, executed, ibid. his dying ſpeech makes a great impreſſion on many perſons, 70
Pawlet, John E. removed from his place of ſteward of the houſhold, 10
Peace; faults of it, 8, peace between England and Sweden, 123
Peerage-bill, debates about it, 122, dropped, 123, brought in again, 130, debates about it, ibid. dropped a ſecond time, ibid.
Pelham, ſir Thomas, made E. of Clore, 12
———, Thomas, made one of the commiſſioners of trade, 98, made ſecretary of war, 183, his ſpeech in the debate about the treaties of Hanover and Vienna, 192, &c.
Pembroke, Thomas Herbert E. of, put up for chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford, 33
Perth, James Drummond E. of, comes to Spain with the pretender, 120
Peru, the Engliſh project to take it, 135
Peterborough, Charles Mordaunt, E. of, returns to England, 6, the French king aſſures him that he would acknowledge K. George, ibid. returns to England, appears at St. James's, and is forbid the court, 20, is ſeized at Bologna, 99, &c. his ſpeech about the bill againſt blaſphemy, 161
Petition, againſt the ſeptennial-bill, 66, of the London clergy againſt the quakers bill, 167
Philip V. K. of Spain, extorts a donative from the Engliſh merchants, 7, pretends to have numberleſs complaints againſt the emperor, 72, ready to contend for the crown of France, ibid. offended at the alliance between England and the D. of Orleans, ibid. falls upon the emperor's dominions, 99, the courts of England and France endeavour to bring about an accommodattion between him and the emperor, ibid. rejects all propoſals, and continues his warlike preparations, 107, his declaration in favour of the pretender, 120, attempts to relieve Fontarabia, 134, abdicates the crown, 184, reſumes it upon his ſon's deceaſe, 188, concludes two treaties with the emperor, 189, &c. remits great ſums to Vienna, 190
Phipps Conſtantine, cauſes K. George to be proclaimed in Ireland, 66, removed from being lord-juſtice and lord-chancellor, 10, created doctor of the civil law at Oxford, 12, preſents a petition to the court at the Old Bailey in favour of Bp. Atterbury, 171
Plague at Marſeilles, a proclamation upon that occaſion, 165, bill to prevent the ſpreading of the plague, 166
Plebeian, the, a pamphlet againſt the peerage-bill, anſwered mr. Addiſon in the Old Whig, 122, 123
Plot diſcovered, 169, addreſſes thereupon, ibid. &c.
Plunket, John, apprehended, 170, had travelled to Rome, 175, votes of the houſe of commons againſt him, ibid. bill to inflict pains and penalties upon him, ibid. &c.
Points, or Poyntz, Stephen, his memorial to the king of Sweden, 198
Poland; the proteſtants oppreſſed in that kingdom, 135
Pope Clement XI. cauſes the E. of Peterborough to be ſeized, 95
Portland, William Bentick E. of, receives particular marks of favour from K. George, 8, created marquis of Titchfield, and D. of Portland, 69, made one of the lords of the bed-chamber, 98, his ſpeech at a court of the South-Sea directors, 147
Port-Mahon, the Spaniards deſire to have it reſtored, 135
Pozzobueno, mrquis de, quits England, leaving a memorial behind him, 198, his letter to the D. of Newcaſtle, ibid.
Pragmatick Sanction, 189, guaranteed by England, 203
Preachers at Whitehall, 183
Pretender poſts to Verſailles upon the news of the queen's death, but Lewis XIV. deſires him to quit his dominions, 7, his manifeſto ſent to ſeveral of the Engliſh nobility, 14, is in Lorrain, 17, a reward of a 100,000l. to ſuch as ſhould ſeize him, 28, rebellion in Scotland in his favour, 29, proclaimed at Caſtletoun, and his ſtandard ſet up at Brae-Mar, 30, his adherents publiſh a manifeſto, 31, &c. his health drank at Oxford, 33, proclaimed in Cornwall, 341, his declaration, 41, lands at Peterhead in Scotland, 48, is proclaimed, and receives the homage of the epiſcopal people at Aberdeen, ibid. attacked with an ague, 49, forms a council, and publiſhes ſix proclamations, ibid. iſſues out an order for burning ſome villages, ibid. embarks at Montroſe, and lands at Gravelin, 51, complains of diſappointments from abroad, ibid. his paper to general Gordon, ibid. the E. of Stair preſents two memorials to the court of France relating to him, 52, removes the L. Bolingbroke from being ſecretary of ſtate, 54, bill in the Iriſh parliament for attainting him, and giving a reward for his head, 57, ſends a letter to the lord-mayor of London, with orders to proclaim him K. of Great-Britain, 59, the jacobites wear white roſes on his birth-day, 69, removes into Italy, 72, &c. conſpiracy to ſet him on the throne by means of Sweden, 73, K. of Sweden's project in his favour, 93, a marriage propoſed between him and the czar's daughter, ibid. cardinal Alberoni projects ſomething in his favour, 115, 120, enters into that cardinal's ſcheme, 59, comes to Spain, ibid. the king of Spain's declaration in his favour, ibid. marries prince Sobieſki's daughter, 121, Sweden engages not to give him any aſſiſtance, 140, pope Clement XI. very kind to him, 164, the pretender's declaration, 173, burnt, ibid. treaty in his favour between the emperor and Spain, 190, deſigns formed in his behalf, 196, &c. mentioned in Palm's memorial, 200
Prior, Matthew, notifies the queen's death to Lewis XIV. who aſſures him that he would maintain the Hanover ſucceſſion, 6, that king's anſwer to him concerning the Catalans, ibid. his memorial to him about the demolition of Dunkirk, 13, ordered home from Paris, 16, lands at Dover, and promiſes to reveal all he knew 18, is introduced to the king, and entertained at dinner by the lord Townſhend, ibid. taken into cuſtody, 23, examined and cloſely confined, 24, prevaricates, ibid. and 29, report of the committee of ſecrecy concerning him, ibid. excepted out of the act of grace, 97, dies, 164
Proteſtants in Germany oppreſſed, 135
Pruſſia, Frederick K. of, the French propoſe to ſet him on the Britiſh throne immediately after the queen's death, 7, included in the treaty between France and the czar, 93, ſee p. 124, very rich, 141
Pulteney, William, his ſpeech about the reward for apprehending the pretender, 5, made ſecretary at war, 10, impeaches L. Widdrington, 58, is againſt offering a pardon to thoſe that were in arms, in Scotland, 59, reſigns his places, 83, his ſpeech on the ſupply againſt Sweden, ibid. about the army, 85, about the propoſal of the South-Sea company, 90, kiſſes the king's hand, 142, his ſpeech at a court of the South-Sea company, 148, moves for an addreſs, 153, is chairman of the committee to examine Layer, 174, made cofferer of the houſhold, 179, begins to be diſſatisfied, 186, turned out of his places, 187, is againſt addreſſing the king upon his ſpeech, 197
Pulteney, Daniel, made one of the commiſſioners of trade, 98, his ſpeech in parliament, 192
Palatine, Charles Theodore elector, oppoſes the ſcheme for electing the archduke king of the Romans, 284, but engages his vote for electing him on certain conditions, 290, 293, many of his troops deſert from the army of the empire, 365
Palliſer, captain, takes poſſeſſion of Quebeck, 443
Papiſts, of Ireland, their loyalty, 425
Parker, lord (earl of Macclesfield's ſon) ſeconds the motion for the repeal of the Jews acts, 301, proceedings relating to his election for Oxfordſhire, 309
———, colonel John, defeated near Ticonderoga, 352
———, captain, his ſucceſs, 382, 426

Parliamentary proceedings, George II. 208, 209, 210, 212, 213, 214, 218, 220, 223, 225, 226, 229, 231, 235, 236, 241, 246, 250, 255, 260, 263, 265, 271, 273, 280, 285, 290, 293, 301, 302, 307, 318, 320, 338, 375, 410, 414, 456
——— in Ireland, George I. 303, 425, 429. See Ireland.
Parliaments, act concerning the election of members of, 379, endeavours used to contract their duration, 381, new act for ascertaining the qualification of members of, 462
Parma, duke of, his death, 214
———, Philip duke of, joins in a defensive league with the emperor, king of Sardinia, &c. 292, remarks on an article of the peace at Aix-la-Chapelle concerning the settlement of the dominions of, 455
Patten, captain, re-enforces Oswego, 329
Paulet, earl, his motion against the king's going to Hanover, 311
Pawnbrokers, an act for the licensing of, 291, bill brought in for the restriction of, ibid. act passed for that purpose, 341
Paxton, mr. Nicholas, committed to Newgate, 243
Payton, captain, his narrow escape, 383
Pelham, Henry, esq. his character, 215, 273, his defence of the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 281, his speeches on the reduction of the interest of the national debt, ibid. remarks on his parliamentary proceedings, 283, he supports the general naturalization-bill, 287, opposes an amendment in the bill for repealing the Jews act, 301, and a motion for repealing a former act in favour of that people, 302, his death, ibid.
Pensons and places, bills passed concerning, 377, 418
Pennsylvania described, 307, disagreement between its governor and assembly, 313, its governor and deputies assist at a treaty with divers Indian nations, 435
Pepperel, sir William, assists in the reduction of Cape-Breton, 257, appointed to the command of a regiment, 308
Persons eminent for learning, &c. 492
Perth (Drummond) duke of, joins the young chevalier, 259
Pestilential fever from the contagion of the sessions of the Old-Bailey, 285
Peyton, commodore, his conduct in the East-Indies, 266
———, ensign, an affecting anecdote, 439
Pharas Cawn, appointed naib of Surat, 444
Philadelphia described, 307
Philip duke of Anjou; treaties between him and England, 211, 214, his manifesto, 234, war between England and him, 235, his death, 267
——, don, his progress in Italy, 246, 250, 255, 257, 265
Philips, sir John, his motion concerning voting for members of parliament, 359
———, captain, contributes to the victory at Minden, 449, and at Warbourg, 482
Pigot, governor, his prudent conduct at Madras, 443
Piracies committed by the English privateers, 387, law concerning the trial of, 416
Pirates made examples of, 423
Pitsligo, lord, joins the young chevalier, 260
Pitt, mr. John, his report concerning the American iron, 342
——, William, esq. signalises himself in the house of commons, 225, 232, 237, appointed secretary of state, and brings a message in favour of German mercenaries, 340, and one concerning admiral Byng, 346, he and his friends are placed in the administration, 348, commanded to resign, ibid. receives honourable testimonies from the people of their approbation of his conduct, ibid. he is restored, to his office, ibid.
Pittsburg, fort Du Quesne so denominated, 391, improvements made there by general Stanwix, 473
Plate, dealers in, taxes upon, 377, 418
Play-house act, proceedings upon, 228
Pococke, admiral, assists in the reduction of Chandernagore, 354, succeeds to the chief command of the fleet, 392, worsts M. d'Apché, 393, tries three of his captains, ibid. defeats M. d'Apché a second time, 393, who leaves him the sovereignty of the Indian seas, ibid. he worsts him a third time, and maintains the sovereignty of the Indian ocean, 445
Poets, eminent, an account of, 492
Poland, factions in, concerning the Russians, 358, and proceedings in the diet of, concerning them and the election of a duke of Courland, 405, invaded by the Prussians, 450, 451, result of its diet, 489.—See Augustus III.
Polwarth, lord, distinguishes himself in the opposition, 224, 228
Pondicherry, French East-India settlement, its reduction, 489
Pondicherry French Indiaman taken, 351
Poor; resolutions concerning, 420, remarks on those resolutions, 421.—See Servants.
Pope Benedict XIV. his death and character, 406
—— Clement XIII. elected, 406, his character, ibid. difference between him and the king of Portugal, 479
Porter, captain, wounded in his engagement with the Florissant, 426
Porteous, captain John, hanged at Edinburgh, 226, proceedings of the house of commons on that affair, 227
Portsmouth, conflagration at, 470
Portugal. See Joseph.
Post-fines, act concerning, 416
Potter, mr. introduces the register bill, 295
Prague invested by the king of Prussia, 361, the siege of it raised, ibid.
Prideaux, general, killed at Niagara, 437
Prince Edward French frigate destroyed, 477
——— George man of war burnt at sea, 383
Privateers, English, piracies committed by, 387, regulations with respect to them, 416
Prize-money, act concerning, 464
Proceedings in parliament, George II. 208, 209, 210, 212, 213, 214, 218, 220, 223, 225, 226, 229, 230, 235, 236, 241, 246, 250, 255, 260, 263, 267, 271, 273, 280, 285, 290, 293, 301, 302, 309, 318, 324, 338, 375, 387, 413, 456 ——— in the Irish parliament, George II. 303, 425, 429. See Ireland.
Protector fire-ship lost, 490
Protestant religion, remarks on the preservation of it being made a pretext for the continental war, 375, 377, 407
Prudent, French man of war, destroyed, 390
Prussia.—See Frederick III. Henry, Ferdinand.
Public-houses, laws for the regulation of, 291, 294, 341
Pulteney, Daniel, esq. his arguments against the bill prohibiting loans to foreign princes, 212
———, William, esq. his conduct in parliament, 209, 215, 217, his name struc out of the list of privy-counsellors, ibid. his conduct in parliament, 220, 235, created earl of Bath, 243
Punishments, reflections on, 250, 464

Q.

Quadruple alliance; 99, 107, Spain signs it, 131, 135
Quakers; bill for taking some words out of their affirmation, 167, petition against it, ibid. some pretend they were not christians, ibid. bill for accepting their affirmation instead of an oath, passed in Ireland, 181
Queensbury, Charles Douglas D. of, made one of the gentlemen of the bed-chamber, 142
Quakers; fate of their petition against tythes, 225
Quarantine act, an account of, 252
Quarendon, lord, joins in the opposition, 243
Quebeck, the siege of it planned, 436, remarks on that scheme, ibid. introduction to the expedition against it, 437, precautions taken for its defence by general Murray, 473, it is besieged by the French, 474, who are obliged to retire with precipitation, ibid.
Queenborough man of war lost, 470
Queensbury, duke of, petitions against the election of the Scottish peers, 224

R.

Ratcliffe, Charles, arraigned, 67, tried and found guilty, 68, escapes, 70
———, dr. John, complained of in the house of commons for not attending Q. Anne, 5
Ratisbone; a declaration delivered to the diet there by mr. Le Heup. 200
Raymond, Robert, made a judge of the King's-Bench, 183, and one of the commissioners of the great-seal, 185
Rebellion in 1715, 28, breaks out in Scotland, 29, progress of it in England, 34, &c.
Rebels, English and Scotch joined, 41, &c. defeated at Preston, 42, some executed there, and at Wigan and Manchester, 59, about a thousand submit to the king's mercy, and petition to be transported, ibid. some more arraigned, 67, &c. several of them discharged, 70, some executed, 71
Reports of the committee of secrecy, 155, &c. of that appointed to examine Layer, 174
Revolution principles, far from being universally embraced, 260, the revolution talked and preached against, 262
Richelieu, D. of, the French embassador at Vienna brings about a peace between Great-Britain and the emperor, 202

Richmond, Charles Lenox D. of, made one of the lords of the bed-chamber, 12, preſents a petition in behalf of the condemned lords, 60
Riots at Briſtol, Chippenham, Norwich, Reading, &c. 12, 13, proclamation for ſuppreſſing riots, 14, riots in London, 22, 23, 69, &c. act againſt riots, 27
Ripperda, baron and duke de, negotiates two treaties between the emperor and Spain, 189, diſmiſſed, 195, flies to the Dutch embaſſador, who carries him to colonel Stanhope's houſe, ibid. taken away from thence by force, and confined in the caſtle of Segovia, ibid. ſome expreſſions he dropped, 190, 192
Robethon, monſieur de, attends K. George to England, 8, infuſes jealouſies into his majeſty of the L. Townſhend, 71
Robinſon, John, head of the independents, 78
————, John, biſhop of London, made one of the privy-council, 10, his ſpeech about an addreſs to the king, 17, his behaviour at the congreſs of Utrecht, 25, votes for the E. of Oxford, 27, his ſpeech about the ſeptennial parliament, 65, his anſwer to a reflecting ſpeech of L. Coningſby about the peace, 77, his ſpeech in the debate about the repeal of the ſchiſm-bill, 118, is for the bill againſt blaſphemy and profaneneſs, 161
Rocheſter, Lawrence Hyde E. of, his ſpeech on the debate on the navy-debt, 165
Rockingham, Lewis Watſon lord, created E. of Rockingham, 11
Roſs, general, his ſpeeches in parliament, 24, ordered to ſell his regiment, 28, is one of the ſecret committee, 152, his ſpeech about the South-Sea affair, 154
Rothes, John Leſley E. of, high-admiral of Scotland, and the king's commiſſioner to the general aſſembly of the church of Scotland, 20, zealous againſt the rebellion, 31, tries to ſecure Perth, 36, marches to Seaton-houſe, 37, the rebels break into the burial place of his family, 38, attempts in vain to make himſelf maſter of Falkland palace, 110
Roxburgh, John Ker E. of, his ſpeech in parliament, 27, acts againſt the rebels in Scotland, 31, made ſecretary of ſtate, and keeper of the ſignet in Scotland, 72, is for the peerage bill, 122
Royal Aſſurance company erected, 140
Rugen, iſle of, reſtored by Denmark, 143
Ruſſians advance againſt Wiſmar, 92, and againſt Schonen, ibid. See Czar.
Rutland, (Mannors) D. of, waits upon K. George at his firſt coming, and is graciouſly received, 8, made knight of the garter, 12
Rye; K. George lands there, 194
Raine, mr. Henry, an account of his hoſpital, 410
Raiſonable French man of war taken, 383
Ramillies man of war wrecked, 451
Randan, duke de, his generous and humane conduct in Hanover, 336
Ratcliffe, Charles eſq. titular earl of Derwentwater, beheaded, 264
Ratiſbon, arret of the evangelical body at, in favour of Brandenburg, Hanover, &c. with the emperor's anſwer to it, 453, complaints exhibited in the diet, 489
Redoubtable French man of war burnt, 427
Regiſter-bill, proceedings on, 295
Regiſters, public, bill for keeping, 380
Reid, general, conducts an Auſtrian corps at Torgau, 488
Reſolution man of war loſt, 428
Revel, a fire at, 450
Richlieu, duke de, account of his ſiege and reduction of St. Philip's caſtle, 324, 325, he ſuperſedes the mareſchal d'Etrées in Germany, 363, penetrates into the Pruſſian dominions with the army, 364, which commits great diſorders, ibid. levies contributions in Halberſtadt, 368, favours Soubiſe's retreat, 370, he expoſtulates with prince Ferdinand on the re-aſſembling the Hanoverians, 374, his proceedings at Zell, ibid. he fixes his head-quarters at Hanover, ibid. he is ſuperſeded by the count de Clermont, 396
Richmond (Lenox) duke of, a munificent patron of genius, 411, his behaviour at Minden approved by prince Ferdinand, 449
Riots in different parts of England, 277, 280, 297, 326, 338, 351, 410
—— in Ireland, 429
Robbers, their audaciouſneſs, 213
Robinſon, ſir Thomas, one of the plenipotentiaries at Aix-la-Chapelle, 271
————, ſir Thomas, appointed ſecretary of ſtate, 302, reſigns the ſeals, and is made maſter of the wardrobe, 318
Rochefort, account of the expedition againſt, 348, &c.
Rodney, admiral, bombards Havre-de-Grace, 427, deſtroys ſome veſſels on the coaſt of France, 478
Rollo, lord, takes poſſeſſion of the iſland of St. John, 390, diſarms the Canadians, 476
Roman Catholicks of Ireland, their loyalty, 429
Romans, proceedings for electing the archduke Joſeph king of, 282, 289, 293
Rothes, earl of, ſignaliſes himſelf at Roucoux, 265
Rouillé, M. his letter to mr. Fox, 220
Rous, captain, his proceedings in America, 312
Rowley, captain, deſtroys the Oriflamme, 383
Rum. See Spirituous Liquors and Sugar Colonies.
Ruſſel, colonel, commands a body of Dutch troops againſt the Engliſh Eaſt-India company, 445
Ruſſians, ordered to aſſiſt the queen of Hungary, 356, their progreſs ſtopped, ibid. they bloc up the Pruſſian ports in the Baltick, 364, quicken their motions, ibid. take Memel, ibid. advance againſt Pruſſia, 367, ſkirmiſh with the Pruſſians, ibid. attacked by mareſchal Lehwald, ibid. make a haſty retreat from the Pruſſian territories, 367, which they re-enter, 400, are defeated at Zorndorf, 401, their barbarities in the Pruſſian dominions, ibid. miſcarry in their attempt upon Colberg, 404, defeat the Pruſſians at Zullichau, 451, and at Cunerſdorf, ibid. part of them detached into Pomerania, 485, which they evacuate, ibid. they begin their march towards Sileſia, ibid. their motions, 486, 487, a detachment of them make an irruption into Brandenburg, 487, and poſſeſs themſelves of Berlin, ibid, inveſt Colberg by ſea and land, 488
Rutowſki, veldt-mareſcal count, the king of Poland's letter to him concerning the Saxon army, 335
Ryder, ſir Dudley, appointed lord chief juſtice of the King's-Bench, 302

S.

Sacheverel, Henry, pereaches at Sutton, 12, the cry about him, 13, he dies, 136, leave dr. Atterbury a legacy, ibid.
Saint Albans, Charles Beauclerk, D. of, made captain of the band of penſioners, 8
St. Januarius's blood 125
St. John, Henry, viſcount Bolingbroke, obliged to ſtand at the door of the council-chamber, 4, removed from his office, 7, 10, attends at the king's coronation, 11, his ſpeech about the addreſſes to the king, 12, his conduct very extraordinary, 18, appears every where, and ſpeaks in parliament with great freedom, but his heart beginning to fail him he goes over to France in diſguiſe, ibid. his letter, ibid. impeached of treaſon, 24, the articles againſt him carried up to the houſe of lords, 28, his name and coat of arms are razed, 29, is ſecretary to the pretender, 52, removed 54, his letters upon that occaſion, ibid. &c. he is pardoned, and returns to England, 179, his attainder reverſed, 186, &c.
St. John, Henry, created viſcount St. John, 69
St. Quintin, ſir William, made one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 11, diſplaſed, 84
St. Sebaſtian taken, 134
Sample, John, taken up for high-treaſon, and eſcapes, 170
Sardinia conquered by the Spaniards, 99, given to the D. of Savoy, ibid. and 107, his miniſter claims the ſhips in the harbour of Meſſina, 129, the troops deſigned for the expedition to Sardinia are ſent to Sicily, ibid. Sardinia evacuated, 131, and given to the D. of Savoy, 133
Savoy, Victor, Amadeus, II. D. of, how nearly his houſe is allied to the Engliſh crown, 3, is perſuaded to change Sicily for Sardinia, 72, enters into a convention with the emperor about Sardinia, 12, put in poſſeſſion of that iſland, 133
Sawbridge, Jacob, expelled the houſe of commons, 154, bill to make his eſtate anſwerable for 250,000l. to the South-Sea company, 158
Saxe-Gotha; ſome of their troops in the pay of Great-Britain, 81
Sayer, ————, taken into cuſtody, 170
Scarborough, Richard Lumley, E. of, lord-lieutenant of Northumberland, repairs to Newcaſtle to ſecure that place, 35, his ſpeech in parliament, 194
Schiſm-bill; a deſign to repeal it, 83, is repealed, 117
Schuylemberg, a proteſtant, general of the Venetian army, 71
Scotland, diſſatisfied with the union, and conſidered itſelf as degraded to a province of England, 8, 9, addreſſes ſet on foot there for diſſolving the union, 15, endeavours uſed there for a remonſtrance againſt it, 17, ſome members of the general aſſembly of the church there had inſtructions to move for an addreſs againſt the toleration of the epiſcopal preachers, and againſt lay patronages, 21, the deſigns of the jacobites carried on there with ſecrecy and order, 28, act for encouraging loyalty there, 29, ſome ſhips land there from France, with officers, arms, &c. 30, ſeveral peers there ſhew their loyalty to K. George, 31, ſome villages burnt by the pretender's order, 49, motion for offering a general pardon to thoſe that were ſtill in arms in Scotland, 59, a few Spaniards land there, 121, ſome ſuſpected perſons ſecured there, 170, commotions there occaſioned by ſome levellers, 184, riots there about the malt-tax, 187

Scots; begin to ſhew their diſcontent, 10. See Scotland and rebels.
Scots highlanders appear in arms, 9
Scottiſh peers; reſolutions about them, in the intended peerage-bill, 122
Seabright murdered in France, 181
Seamen; more employed than provided for by parliament, 166
Seckendorf, count, reduces the iſland of Lipara, 125, and Sacca, 131, wounded, 133
Septennial parliament; act for them, 63, petitions againſt it, 10, paſſed, ibid.
Seville, treaty of, 203
Shepheard, James, forms a deſign upon K. George's life, 102, executed, 103
Sherlock, dr. William, one of the committee to examine biſhop Hoadley's books, 91, writes againſt him, 92, &c. removed from being the king's chaplain, 93
Sherrard, Bennet, lord, erected baron of Harborough, 12
Shippen, William, his ſpeech about the arrears due to the Hanover troops, and about the reward for apprehending the pretender, 5, about the bill for regulating the forces, 22, in favour of the E. of Oxford, 23, about the ſuſpenſion of the habeas corpus act, 58, in behalf of the condemned lords, 60, upon the ſeptennial bill, 66, about a ſupply, 81, about an addreſs, 85, upon the earl of Oxford's impeachment, 95, about the king's ſpeech, for which he is ſent to the Tower, 101, about the repeal of the ſchiſm-bill, 119, moves for an addition in an addreſs, 150, a ſpeech of his gravels ſecretary Craggs, 152, mr. Pulteney calls him a traitor, 177
Shrewſbury, Charles Talbot E. of, received with great favour by K. George, 8, his ſpeech about the addreſs to K. George, 17, againſt the ſeptennial bill, 65
Shute, Barrington, his ſpeech in vindication of K. George's government, 83
Sicily; project for exchanging it for Sardinia, 72, given to the emperor, 99, 107, the K. of Spain makes great preparations for the recovery of it, 107, retaken by the Engliſh and Imperialiſts, 125, the emperor ſends more troops thither, 129, evacuated by the the Spaniards, 131, 133
Sinking-fund conſtituted, 90, 201
Smalridge, George, votes in favour of the earl of Oxford, 27, refuſes to ſign a declaration teſtifying an abhorrence of the rebellion, 40, removed from the office of lord almoner, ibid. is againſt the univerſities addreſſing king George, 79, 80, his ſpeech in the debate about repealing the ſchiſm-bill, 118
Small-pox inoculated, 183
Somerſet, Charles Seymour D. of, made maſter of the horſe, and one of the privy-council, 10, offers to be ſir William Wyndham's bail, and is removed from his place of maſter of the horſe, 32, moves for the peerage bill, 121
Sommers, John, received with great favour by K. George, 8, dies, 68
Sophia, Dorothy, wife of K. George I. dies, 204
South-Sea company; debts due to them from the government, 87, K. George choſen governor, 104, preſent their ſcheme to the government, 138, South-Sea ſcheme, ibid. acts for increaſing their capital ſtoc, 139, whence that ſcheme took its riſe, 144, &c. the ſtoc falls, ibid. account of the proceedings of the directors, ibid. they make ſome ſecret advances towards an union with the Eaſt-India company, 147, a committee of them meet a committee of the bank, and draw up the bank contract, 148, proceedings of the commons in the South-Sea affair, 151, mr. Walpole's ſcheme for ingrafting one million of South-Sea ſtoc, into the Bank of England, 152, bill to reſtrain the ſub-governor, &c. from going out of the kingdom, ibid. the directors removed from all places in the government, 153, reports of the committee of ſecrecy about them, 155, &c. allowances to the directors out of their own eſtates, 158, &c. reſolutions of the commons in favour of the ſufferers by the South-Sea ſcheme, 159, what the capital ſtoc of the company was at the year 1720, 160, petitions and pamphlets againſt the directors, ibid. &c. general court of the company, 161, 178, acts to enable the South-Sea company to diſpoſe of the effects in their hands, 167, and for hearing claims upon the eſtates of the South-Sea directors, ibid. two millions of their ſtoc transferred to the Bank, and two millions of their ſtoc revived, 178
Southwell, Thomas, created viſcount Southwell, 98
Spain, the K. of, pretends to have numberleſs complaints againſt the emperor, 72, ready to contend for the crown of France, ibid. offended at the alliance between England and the D. of Orleans, ibid. great preparations made in Spain, 98, a great fleet fitted out to recover Sicily, 107, that fleet deſtroyed by the Engliſh, 110, the Engliſh merchants in Spain ſecure their beſt effects, ibid. are ill uſed, 112, ſeveral grievances upon them, 115, war declared by England againſt Spain, 119, and by France, 120, the Spaniſh ſquadron ſails from Cadiz for England, ibid. Spain accedes to the quadruple alliance, 131, 135, makes overtures for a peace, ibid. peace and alliance between Great-Britain and Spain, 163, taken into conſideration in the houſe of lords, 166, two treaties between Spain and the emperor, 189, private treaty between them, 190, makes great prepararions for war, 195, &c. the Spaniards caval about the preliminaries, 202
Sparre, baron, in a plot to ſet the pretender on the Engliſh throne, 73, extracts of his letters, 75
Squadrons, three fitted out, 194
Stair, John Dalrymple E. of, ſent embaſſador to France, 12, made one of the lords of the bed-chamber, ibid. ſent embaſſador to Paris, 16, has ſeveral conferences with marquis de Torcy about Mardyke, ibid. choſen one of the ſixteen peers of Scotland, ibid. preſents two memorials to the court of France, concerning the pretender, 52
Standing army; debates about one, 101
Stanhope, James, made ſecretary of ſtate, 10, lays before the houſe of commons the papers relating to the late negotiations of peace and commerce, 19, ſupplies R. Walpole's place as chairman of the committee of ſecrecy, 20, impeaches the D. of Ormond of treaſon, 24, his letter to the vice-chancellor and mayor of Oxford, 33, communicates to the privy-council the informations the king had received of a conſpiracy, 73, he and mr. Methuen write a circular letter upon the ſeizing of count Gyllemburg, 74, made chancellor of the exchequer, 84, a quarrel had like to ariſe between him and R. Walpole, 90, created baron Elvaſton, and viſcount Mahon, 98, ſent embaſſador to Spain, 99, made one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, and created an earl, 107, delivers articles to the court of Madrid, 115, gives the houſe of lords an account of the treaties lately concluded, 116, moves for the repeal of the teſt-act, 117, his anſwer to the czar's memorial, 141, dies, 154
Stanhope, brigadier and afterwards general, receives particular marks of favour from K. George, 8, one of the cabinet-council, 10
———, colonel, the preſent E. of Harrington, envoy extraordinary to Madrid, 109, cauſes ſeveral ſtores in the ports of Biſcay to be deſtroyed, 112, preſents ſeveral memorials to the court of Spain, 119, embaſſador at Madrid, 190, the D. of Ripperda flies to his houſe for ſhelter, 195, his memorial upon that duke's being taken by force out of his houſe, 196, leaves Madrid, 202
———, Charles, great quantities of South-Sea ſtoc given him, 155, his name eraſed in the book, ibid. and 158, his caſe taken into conſideration by the houſe of commons, 157, made treaſurer of the chamber, 163
States of Holland; their anſwer to Klingrafe's memorial, 7, K. George thanks them for it, ibid. a treaty concluded between them, K. George and the D. of Orleans, 72, ſuſpend their conſent to the quadruple alliance, 108, accede to it, ibid. K. George demands of them two thouſand men upon the rumour of an invaſion, which they ſend, 120, 121, mediators of peace between Spain, &c. but K. George and the emperor will not accept their mediation, 134, the Spaniſh embaſſador delivers to them a plan of peace, 135, accede to the treaty of Hanover, 196
Steele, Richard, offers a petition in behalf of the condemned lords, 60
Stetin given up to Pruſſia, 141
Strafford, Thomas Wentworth E. of, was firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, 4, notifies to the ſtates the queen's death, and the acceſſion of K. George to the throne, 7, accompanies the princeſs of Wales to Rotterdam, 11, returns to England, and has his papers ſeized, 16, is impeached, 25, the articles againſt him carried into the houſe of lords, 28, his ſpeech in the debate about the mutiny-bill, 74, 105, about an addreſs, 116
Strickland, ſir William, propoſes to attaint the E. of Oxford, 96
Subſidy to Sweden, 161

Sunderland, Robert Spencer E. of, received with great favour by K. George, 8, made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 10, infuſes jealouſies in the king of the L. Townſhend, and R. Walpole, 71, appointed ſole treaſurer of Ireland, 72
———, Charles Spencer E. of, made ſecretary of ſtate, 84, appointed preſident of the council, and firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, 107, was againſt repealing the teſt, 117, had promoted the difference in the royal family, 137, ſtoc given him, 155, the houſe of commons take that affair into conſideration, 158, &c. reſigns the place of firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, 158, his death and character, 168
Surman, Robert, deputy caſhier of the South-Sea examined by the lords, 153, his papers ſeized, and himſelf ordered into cuſtody, 154, the allowance made him, 159
Suſpenſion of arms proclaimed at Paris, 187
Sutherland, John Sutherland E. of, elected one of the ſixteen peers of Scotland, 16, his ſpeech in parliament, 27, ſhews his zeal againſt the rebellion, 31, advances to attac the earl of Seaforth, 18, the marquis of Huntley, and the earl of Seaforth capitulate with him, 50
Sweden; bill to prohibit commerce with Sweden, 80, treaty between England and that kingdom, 82, the Britiſh ſhips confiſcated there, ibid. ſupply againſt Sweden, ibid. and 84, debate in the houſe of commons about the trade with Sweden, 106, peace between Sweden and England, and a treaty of alliance, 123, gives up Bremen and Verden to the elector of Hanover, 140, guarantee the ſucceſſion to the crown of Great-Britain, ibid. gives up ſome places to the king of Pruſſia, 141, has ſome reſtored by Denmark, ibid. ſubſidy to that court, 161, peace between Sweden and Muſcovy, 163, 179, accede to the treaty of Hanover, 196, 200
Swift, Jonathan, a packet directed to him, ſeized, for which he abſconds, 23, his verſes about Wood's halfpence, 181
Sword-blade company ſtop payments, 149
Synods of Glaſcow, Air, &c. animate perſons of all ranks to the defence of K. George and the conſtitution, 37
Syracuſe blocked up by the Spaniards, 112, admiral Byng put in there, ibid.
Sackville, lord George, appointed to enquire in the miſcarriage of the expedition againſt Rochefort, 349, attends the duke of Marlborough in the attempt upon St. Maloes, 384, and goes with him to Germany, ibid. animoſity between him and prince Ferdinand, 448, his ſituation at Minden, 466, popular clamour againſt him, 465, his addreſs to the public, ibid. he demands a court-martial, 466, ſubſtance of the charge againſt him, ibid. particulars of his defence, ibid. remarks on his defence, 467, ſentence of the court-martial, 468
Sail-cloth, acts concerning, 282, 377, 462
Salabatzing, ſubah of Decan, concludes a treaty with the Engliſh Eaſt-India company, 444
Salt, propoſal for making, in America, 381
Sanderſon, ſir Thomas, ſubſtance of his ſpeech againſt the convention with Spain, 232
Sandwich (Montague) E. of, diſtinguiſhes himſelf by his oppoſition to the miniſterial meaſures, and the keeping of Hanoverians in Britiſh pay, 237, 249, 250, one of the plenipotentiaries at Aix-la-Chapelle, 271
Sandys, S. eſq. his motions in the houſe of commons, 220, 221, 225, 231, 237, appointed chancellor of the exchequer, &c. 243, oppoſes the motion for the repeal of the ſeptennial act, ibid.
———, lord, his remarks on the bill for the herring fiſhery, 282
Santos, iſles of, compriſed in the capitulation of Guadaloupe, 435
Sardinia, Charles Emanuel king of, mounts the throne, 211, impriſons his father, 217, joins with France and Spain againſt the emperor, 220, declares in favour of the queen of Hungary, 245. See Charles
Saumarez, captain, his ſucceſs, 375, 387
Saunders, admiral, ſuperſedes admiral Weſt, 323, ſails to Cape-Breton, 437, ſteers up the river St. Laurence, 438, his fleet endangered by a ſtorm, and the enemy's fireſhips, ibid. his operations in reducing Quebeck, 439, 440, 442, thanks of the houſe of commons voted to him, 443, he returns to England, ibid.
Saxe, count de, appointed commander of the troops deſigned for an invaſion of England in favour of the chevalier de St. George, 251, his progreſs in the Netherlands, 253, 254, 257, 264, &c.
Saxe-Gotha, Frederick III. D. of, furniſhes his troops for the defence of Hanover, 361, his capital taken by the Imperialiſts and French, 368, contributions raiſed at, by the Pruſſians, 450
———, Hildburghauſen, prince of, aſſembles the army of the empire, 367, joins the prince of Soubiſe, 368, defeated at Roſbach, 369, &c.
Saxony.—See Auguſtus
Scalping deſcribed, 438
Schmettau, count, the Pruſſian general, burns the ſuburbs of Dreſden, 401
Schomber, captain, his operations in the river St. Laurence, 475
Schuyler, colonel, ſlowneſs of his regiment, 315
Schweidnitz taken by the Auſtrians, 370, inveſted by the Pruſſians, 371, and reduced, 399
Schwerin city bombarded and pillaged by the Pruſſians, 450
———, mareſchal, conducts a Pruſſian corps into Bohemia, 358, killed near Prague, 359
Scotch brigade in the Dutch ſervice, an act concerning, 319
Scotland; laws relating to the forfeited eſtates in, 291, 378, alarm in, of a French deſcent, 429, 471, attempt to eſtabliſh a militia there, 460, new acts concerning treaſon, and diſarming the highlands there, 464
Scroop, captain, aſſiſts in the defence of St. Philip's fort, 322
Sea-officers, fund eſtabliſhed for the relief of their widows, 286
Seamen, bill for regiſtering them, 235, 236, progreſs of a bill relating to them, 274, bill for keeping a certain number of, regiſtered, in pay, 276, bill brought in for the better payment of their wages, 342, and paſſed, 378, ſcheme for regiſtering them, 379, bill concerning their prize and bounty money, 464
Seceſſion of the chief members of the oppoſition from parliament, 233, their apology, 235
Senecas, Indians, treaty between the Britiſh colonies and them, 436
Senegal, expedition to, 388
Septennial act; motions to repeal it, 221, 243
Servants, clauſe relating to the ſettlement of, 379
Shebbeare, dr. his trial, 410
Sheridan, ſir Thomas, attends the young chevalier to Scotland, 258
Sheriffs, reflexions on their power in parliamentary returns, 310
Shippen, William eſq. his character, 208, his ſpeeches in parliament, ibid.
Ships, liſt of, loſt, taken, and deſtroyed by the Engliſh and French during the war, 494
Shipwrecs, an act concerning, 252
Shirley, governor, appointed to the command of a regiment, 308, his ſon killed, 313, he ſucceeds to the command of the army in North-America, ibid. gets the command of an expedition againſt Niagara, 314, 315, arrives at Oſwego, ibid. where he orders two forts to be begun, ibid. and returns to Albany, ibid. he is ſucceeded by general Abercrombie, 326
Shropſhire, riots in, 338
Shuldam, captain, aſſiſts in taking Guadaloupe, 432
Sicily.—See Charles and Ferdinand
Sileſia loan, differences concerning, adjuſted, 425
Silk, acts concerning, 283, 343, 378
Silver-coin, order concerning, with remarks, 422
Sinclair, general, his expedition to Bretange, 266
Sirenne, French frigate, taken, 477
Six-Nations, conference with them at Albany, 308, they refuſe to join general Shirley, 315, conclude an alliance with the Britiſh colonies, 435, act under the Britiſh banner, 437, 486
Skinner, captain, his bravery and death, 472
Sloane, ſir Hans, his muſeum purchaſed by parliament, 296, its contents, ibid.
Smith, captain, ſent to deſtroy two ſhips off Toulon, 427, like to fall into a miſtake at Quebeck, 441
Smugglers, an act concerning, 343, complaints againſt, in America, 476
Society for the encouragement of arts, manufactures, and commerce, inſtituted, 411 ———for the encouragement of drawing, ſculpture, &c. 275
Soldiers, bill for limiting their time of ſervice, 448, thoſe in America and Germany furniſhed with jackets, blankets, &c. by private contribution, 443.—See mutiny
Soleil Royal, French man of war, deſtroyed, 429
Soltikoff, count, defeats the Pruſſians at Zullichau, 451, and at Cunerſdorf, 472, paſſes the Viſtula, 485
Somerſet, lord Noel, a remarkable motion made by him in the houſe of commons, 242
———, captain, wounded, 445
Soubiſe, prince de, ſent with a French army into Germany, 356, he takes poſſeſſion of ſeveral places belonging to the king of Pruſſia for the uſe of the queen of Hungary, 357, joins the army of the empire, 368, is defeated at

Roſbach, 369, &c. retreats to Halberſtadt, 370, aſſembles a body of troops at Hanau, 397, penetrates into Heſſe-Caſſel, where his van is defeated by the militia, 398, detaches a party under the duke de Broglio, who defeats the prince of Yſenbourg, ibid. he takes poſſeſſion of Gottingen, ibid. worſts general Oberg at Landwernhagen, 399, takes poſſeſſion of Franckfort, 447
South-Sea ſcheme, further proceedings relative to, 219, 220 ——— company obtains certain ſatisfaction on account of the aſſiento, 285
Spain.—See Ferdinand and Charles
Spaniſh Main, the nature of its climate, 239
Spaniſh-Town, in Jamaica, contentions between, and Kingſton, 345
Spirituous liquors, bills concerning, 459, 463.—See diſtillation
Spotſwood, governor, projects the Ohio company, 299
Spry, captain, his ſucceſs, 330
St. Germain, count de, ſent under mr. D'Etrées into Germany, 356, and with a detachment to Crevelt, 397, where he is defeated, ibid. he is repulſed by the duke of Holſtein near Erſdorf, 481, ſkirmiſhes between his corps and the allies, ibid. he reſigns his commiſſion in diſguſt, 488
St. John, iſland of, taken, 390
St. Maloes, expedition againſt, 384, 385
Stainville, M. de, worſts major Bulow at Munden, 483, at Schaken, 484, and raiſes contributions at Halberſtadt, ib.
Stair (Dalrymple) E. of, deprived of his regiment of dragoons, 222, petitions againſt the election of the Scottiſh peers, 224, appointed field-mareſchal and embaſſador to Holland, 243, thwarted at the battle of Dettingen, 249, made commander in chief in Great-Britain, 251
Stanhope, earl, his motion, 247
Staniſlaus, elected king of Poland, 220, abdicates the throne, 226
———, king, letter to him from the king of Pruſſia on his offering the city of Nancy for a place of congreſs, 459
Stanwix, gen. erects a fort at the paſs of Oneida, 391, commands a detachment in the neighbourhood of lake Ontario, 436, eſtabliſhes the Britiſh intereſt on the Ohio, 473
Statute-merchant, and Statute-ſtaple, an account of, 420
Steele, captain, aſſiſts in taking Guadaloupe, 436
Stephens, Alexander, his great age, 425
Stevens, admiral, ſails for the Eaſt-Indies, 351, joins admiral Pococke, 393, is wounded, ibid. aſſiſts in the reduction of Pondicherry, 448, part of his ſquadron wrecked, ibid. his remonſtrance to the Daniſh and Dutch ſettlements, ibid.
Stile altered, 228
Stirn, mr. aſſaſſination by, 470
Stormont (Murray) viſcount of, viſits the king of Pruſſia at Dreſden, 334
Storr, captain, loſes the calf of one leg in an engagement with a French ſhip, 383
Strange, lord, (earl of Derby's ſon) his character, 275, he oppoſes the extenſion of the military law to the Eaſt-India company's ſettlements, 302
Strathallan, viſcount, joins the young chevalier, 259
Stuart, gen. embarks with adm. Byng for Minorca, 322
——, capt. his narrow eſcape from being maſſacred, 473
——, lieutenant, his ſucceſs and bravery, 477
Suckling, captain, his bravery, 361
Sugar-colonies, deliberations concerning, 295, acts for encouraging the trade of, 377, 378, 463
Sulkowſky, prince, made priſoner by a Pruſſian corps, 450
Sunderland man of war loſt, 490
Superbe, French man of war foundered, 429
Supplies granted by parliament, 274, 281, 286, 291, 293, 301, 309, 318, 319, 339, 340, 375, 413, 436
Surat, in the Eaſt-Indies, deſcribed, 241, its reduction by captain Richard Maitland, 444
Sutton, ſir Robert, expelled the houſe of commons, 216
Swanton, commodore, his proceedings in the river St. Laurence, 475
Swedes, their operations, 368, 371, 405, 450, 485, 488, 489.—See Frederick and Adolphus

T.

Talbot, William, biſhop of Oxford, tranſlated to Saliſbury, 19
Temple, ſir Richard, created baron of Cobham, and appointed envoy to the court of Vienna, 12
Teſt and corporation acts, remarks on them made in parliament, 117, 118
Thomand, Henry Obrian, earl of, created viſcount Tadcaſter, 12
Thompſon, ſir William, recorder of London, tries the rebels, 62, ſpeech for the ſeptennial-bill, 66, added to the ſecret committee, 94, his ſpeech at the earl of Oxford's trial, 95, and on the repeal of the ſchiſm-act, 119, quarrel between him and mr. Lechmere, 138
Thorn; account of the proſecution there, 184
Torcy, marquis de, his letter to d'Iberville, 6, his paper to mr. Prior about the pretender, 14
Tories, propoſes a million for the civil-liſt for K. George, 5, afraid of being turned out of their places, 8, were ingaged in dangerous practices, ibid. why diſliked by K. George, 10, ſacrificed to his reſentment, and that of the allies, ibid. pretend that the pretender's manifeſto was a contrivance of the whigs, 14, publiſh a circular letter about the election of the ſixteen Scotch peers, 16, about a third part of them in the houſe of commons, 1714-15, 19, their debates about the civil-liſt, 21, about penſions, ibid. and regulating the land-forces, ibid. endeavours to put off the conſideration of the report of the committee of ſecrecy, 23
Torrington, Arthur Herbert, lord, made one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 84
———, George Byng, lord viſcount, motion for an addreſs to have his inſtructions laid before the houſe of lords, 166
Tournay made part of the barrier, 70
Townſhend, Charles, lord viſcount, received with great favour by K. George, 8, made one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate, 10, his meſſage to the duke of Lorraine's miniſter, 14, entertains mr. Prior with ſeveral noblemen at dinner, 18, a letter of his to the D. of Argyle intercepted by the rebels, 38, removed from the office of ſecretary of ſtate, 71, reſigns his place of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 83, is againſt the peerage bill, 122, admitted to kiſs the king's hand, 142, made preſident of the council, and one of the lords-juſtices in the king's abſence, ibid. appointed ſecretary of ſtate, 163, his letter to the lord mayor of London about the plot, 169
———, Charles, created baron of Lynn-Regis, 155
Treaty of peace between Spain and Portugal, 7, barrier-treaty, 13, treaty between Great-Britain and Denmark, 23, between England and Spain, and the D. of Orleans, 69, between England, Holland, and the ſame duke, 72, with the emperor, 74
—— of commerce; a new treaty of commerce between England and Spain, 74
—— between the emperor and the king of Sicily, 107, between England and Sweden, 123, 140, between Sweden and Pruſſia, 141, between England and Denmark, 142, 143
—— of peace between Great-Britain and Spain, 163, between the Moors and England, 164, private treaty between the emperor and Spain, which alarms K. George, 190, of Hanover, ibid. debates in parliament about it, 191, of Seville, 203, of Vienna, ibid.
Trevor, ſir Thomas, not ſent for into K. George's bed-chamber, 8, removed, 15, is againſt the ſeptennial-bill, 63, 64, preſents the earl of Oxford's petition, 94, was for the bill againſt blaſphemy, 161, made lord privy-ſeal, 194
Triennial parliaments; act for them repealed, 63
Trinity; diſputes about it, 15, directions given by the king concerning it, ibid. &c. diſpute between the diſſenters about it, 136, K. George's directions about it, 161
Triple alliance, 74
Tullibardine, William Murray, marquis of, engaged in the pretender's ſervice, 30, joins the reſt of the rebels, 36, at the battle of Dumblain, 45, forced to leave the earl of Mar, in order to cover his own country, 47, bill to attaint him, 59, lands in Scotland, 121, eſcapes, ibid.
Turks defeated before Corfu, 71, defeated by prince Eugene, 98, invade the Venetian territories, ibid. peace between them and the emperor, 108, the emperor complains that the courts of Great-Britain and France had endeavoured to ſtir up the Turks againſt him, 200
Turner, ſir Charles, made one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 142
Tuſcan, dominions; pretenſions of the Imperial and Spaniſh courts to them, 72
Tuſcany, Parma and Placentia, to be ſettled on the queen of Spain's eldeſt ſon, 99, 107, 135
Talbot, mr. created a lord, and appointed chancellor, 220, his death, 226
———, lord, his magnanimous reply to the E. of Cholmondely, 238, he oppoſes the extention of the laws of treaſon, 252
Tallow, Iriſh, allowed to be imported into England, 417
Tavora, the marquis and marchioneſs of, &c. put to death for a conſpiracy againſt the king of Portugal, 407, 456
Taylor, captain, his bravery and ſucceſs, 477

Temeraire, French man of war, taken, 427
Temple (Grenville) earl, oppoſes the repeal of the Jews act, 301, and a clauſe in the addreſs, 318, appointed lord privy-ſeal, 348
Terpſichore, French frigate, taken, 471
Theodore, king of Corſica, ungenerouſly treated in England, 291, 292
Theſée, French man of war, foundered, 429
Thierry, Joſeph, his information concerning Rochefort, &c. 350
Thomond (Wyndham Obrien) E. of, appointed treaſurer of the houſhold, 348
Thornton, mr. his motion concerning the militia, 291, he oppoſes the regiſter-bill, 295
Thurot, M. an account of, 428, ſails from Dunkirk, 429, alarms the Scottiſh coaſt, and ſails to Gottenburg, ibid. and Bergen, 471, lands in Scotland, ibid. makes a deſcent at Carrickfergus, ib. he is ſlain, and his ſquadron taken, ib.
Ticonderoga, unſucceſsful attempt againſt, 391, new expedition planned againſt it, 436, with animadverſions, ibid. it is abandoned by the French, and taken poſſeſſion of by general Amherſt, ibid.
Tilbury man of war loſt, 416
Tillicherry, in the Eaſt-Indies, deſcribed, 303
Titcomb, colonel, killed, 314
Tobago, iſland, taken poſſeſſion of by the French, 278, who are obliged to evacuate it, ibid.
Torgau taken by the Imperialiſt, 452
Tottleben, general, his operations, 485
Townſhend, viſcount, reſigns the ſeals, 211
———, commodore, his ſucceſs, 257
———, honourable Charles, appointed a lord of the admiralty, 302, preſents a militia-bill, 320, promotes another, 340, prepares a bill concerning the puniſhment of governors of plantations, 343, his report concerning Milford-Haven, 345
———, hon. George, his motion on the mutiny-bill, 282, he moves for a militia-bill, 340, his patriotiſm, 438, he deſtroys a French battery at the river Montmorenci, 439, his motion at the attac of the entrenchment at Montmorenci, ibid. forms a plan for landing the troops near the heights of Abraham, 441, and aſſiſts in the execution of it, ibid. his ſtation at the battle of Quebeck, ibid. and gallant behaviour, 442, the command devolves to him, ibid. his further operations in completing the victory, ibid. he is thanked by the houſe of commons, 443, returns to England, ibid.
———, colonel Roger, killed at Ticonderoga, 436
Trapaud, brigadier, accompanies general Hopſon to the Weſt-Indies, 431
Traquair, (Stuart) earl of, committed to the Tower, 263
Trelawney, captain, aſſiſts in taking Guadaloupe, 432
Trentham, lord, account of his election for Weſtminſter, 486, 490, 491
Trollop, major, blown up at Guadaloupe, 433
Troy, captain, his bravery, 392
Tullibardins, (Murray) marquis of, taken priſoner, and ſent to the Tower, 263
Turkey trade laid open, 294, French cloths prohibited to be imported within its limits, 417
Turner, ſir Edward, proceedings relating to his election for Oxfordſhire, 309
Turnpikes, riots on account of, 280
Tuſcaroras, Indians, treaty between the Britiſh colonies and them, 435
Tuteloes, their treaty with the Britiſh colonies, ibid.
Twightwees, Indians, ſome account of, 404, they decline a treaty with the Britiſh colonies, 482
Tyrawley, lord, ſuperſedes general Fowke in the command at Gibraltar, 323
Tyrrel, captain, his proceedings at Tobago, 278, gallant exploit of, 392

U.

Ulrica Eleonora, queen of Sweden, makes peace with England, 123, gets her huſband, Frederick prince of Heſſe-Caſſel, elected K. of Sweden, 144
Union of England and Scotland, the great good of it, and why ſo earneſtly deſired by K. William, 4, addreſſes ſet on foot in Scotland for diſſolving the union, 15, endeavours for a remonſtrance againſt the union, 17, 21
Uſedom iſland given to the K. of Pruſſia, 141
Unamies, their treaty with the Britiſh colonies, 435
Uverdale, captain, aſſiſts in taking Guadaloupe, 434, and in defeating the French fleet, 477

V.

Vanderbeck, major-general, commands the Dutch forces ſent againſt the rebels, 50
Vane, William, created baron and viſcounts, 142
Venice; their dominions invaded by the Turks, 98
Vernon, George, lord Willoughby, brings in a bill for ſuppreſſing blaſphemy and profaneneſs, 161
Vindication of the biſhop of Exeter, 103
Votes of credit, wherein different from clauſes of approbation, 201
Vaudreuil, marquis de, his ſurrender at Montreal, 475
———, M. de, arreſts the young chevalier, 219
Valeur, French frigate taken, 477
Vandeput, ſir George, account of his competition for Weſtminſter, 283, 287, 288
Ventilators ſet up on priſons, 284
Vernon, admiral ſent to the Weſt-Indies, 235, his character, ibid. takes Porto-Bello, ibid. ſails to Carthagena, 239, his oparations there, ibid. ſails to Cuba, ibid. his further operations in the Weſt-Indies, 246, commands in the channel, 260
Ville, general de la, throws a re-enforcement into Olmutz, 399, commands a corps of Auſtrians in Sileſia, 402, undertakes the ſiege of Coſel, 403, which he is forced to abandon, 404, re-enters Sileſia, 450
Viller, M. de, his operations in America, 308
Virgin ſloop, re-taken by the French, 477, &c.
Virginia deſcribed, 307, diſputes between the governor and people, 308
Viſagapatam, in the Eaſt-Indies, deſcribed, 304, taken by the French, 355
Volunteers, bounties given to, 423

W.

Wade, brigadier, marches to Bath with ſome forces, 33, puts a guard upon count Gyllemberg, and ſeizes his papers, 74, in the expedition to Vigo, 134, quells the riot at Glaſgow, 187, diſarms the highlanders, 188
Wager, Charles, made one of the commiſſioners of the admiralty, 107, ſails with a ſquadron to Ruſſia, 194, returns to England, 195, ſails to the relief of Gibraltar, 202
Wake, dr. William, made lord almoner, 40, archbiſhop of Canterbury, is againſt repealing the ſchiſm-act, 118, had proteſted againſt paſſing that ſame act, 119, preſents an addreſs to the king upon his return, 135, is againſt the quakers-bill, 167
Wallop, John, made one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 84, created baron Wallop and viſcount Lymingon, 142
Walpole, Robert, moves for making good to K. George all parliamentary funds, 4, made receiver and pay-maſter-general of the guards and garriſons, and other forces in Great-Britain, and pay-maſter to Chelſea hoſpital, and privy-counſellor, 10, choſen chairman of the committee of ſecrecy, 21, draws up the report, 23, carries up to the houſe of lords the articles of impeachment againſt the L. Bolingbroke, 28, the E. of Sunderland infuſes jealouſies of him into the king, 71, thought to be in a good diſpoſition for the Swediſh invaſion, 80, reſigns his places, 83, a quarrel had like to ariſe between him and mr. Stanhope, 90, was againſt allowing more than 12,000 men for a ſtanding army, 101, votes for the mutiny-bill, 104, brings about a reconciliation between the king and the prince of Wales, 142, taken again into favour, ibid. made pay-maſter-general of the forces, ibid. how far concerned in the Bank-contract, 148, his ſcheme for reſtoring the public credit, 152, made firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, 158, 163, one of the lords-juſtices, and acts as ſecretary of ſtate, 179, oppoſes the L. Bolingbroke's pardon, 179, 186, created knight of the Bath and of the garter, 187, negotiates a convention between England and Spain, 202, &c.
———, Robert junior, ſon of the preceding, created a peer, 179
———, Horace, moves for the payment of the arrears due to the Hanover troops, 5, made ſecretary of the treaſury, 163, ſent embaſſador to France, 183, had orders to interpoſe in favour of the proteſtants, 184
Walton, ſir George, ſails to the Baltick, 194
War declared againſt Spain, 119
Waugh, John, made Bp. of Carliſle, 179
Webb, major-general, ordered to ſell his regiment, 28
Welſh copper and lead company, open the books, 146
Weems, David Weems E. of, whence deſcended, 39
Weſtmoreland, Thomas Fane E. of, made firſt commiſſioner of trade, 142
Wharton, Thomas lord, received with great favour by K. George, 8, made lord privy-ſeal, 10, his ſpeech about the addreſs to the king, 49, his death and character, 20
Wharton, Philip D. of, his ſpeech about the South-Sea ſcheme, 138, one of the hell-fire club, 161, goes to Vienna, Rome, and Madrid, 190, receives orders to return to England, ibid.

Whigs; elated at K. George's acceſſion, 8, he was fond of them, 10, enemies of France, ibid. have the majority in the parliament, 16, ſaid to intend to give the king a larger revenue than his predeceſſors had enjoyed, 21, divided, 82, 91, exclaimed againſt the creation of peers in Q. Anne's reign, 121
Whitehall preachers appointed by K. George, 183
Whiteſhed, William, made chief-juſtice of Ireland, 10
Widdrington, William lord, diſcharged, 97
Wight, captain, his letter about the D. of Ormond, 23
Wightman, major-general, his account of the battle of Dumblain, 45, &c. defeats the rebels in Scotland, 121
William, K. a picture of his burnt, 23, debate about the conſpirators againſt him, 164
William-Auguſtus, now duke of Cumberland born, ibid.
Williamſon, captain, brings to England the news of the concluſion of the barrier-treaty, 47
Wintoun, George Seaton E. of, takes arms for the pretender, 35, his character, 37, adviſes the highlanders not to march into England, 41, goes off, but ſoon returns, however, he is never after called to any council of war, ibid. taken priſoner at Preſton, 44, committed to the Tower, 48, impeached, 58, condemned, 59, eſcapes out of the Tower, 70
Wiſmar taken by the confederates, 92
Wollin Iſland given to Pruſſia, 141
Wood, William, account of his half-pence, 180
Wyndham, ſir William, ſome move for making him chairman of the grand committee of ſubſidy, 5, his ſpeech about the arrears to the Hanover troops, ibid. objects againſt the king's proclamation for calling a new parliament, 19, reprimanded for it by the ſpeaker, ibid. taken into the cuſtody of a meſſenger, 31, and committed to the Tower, 32, 67, diſcharged, and moves that dr. Snape be appointed to preach before the committee on K. Charles's reſtoration, 91
Waddington, mr. Robert, ſent to obſerve the tranſit of Venus, 478
Waldegrave, gen. John, appointed to enquire into the miſcarriage againſt Rochefort, 349, his bravery at Minden, ibid. and at Warbourg, 483
Walker, captain, appointed engineer in the expedition againſt Senegal, 338
———, captain George, his caſe, 419
Wall, don Ricardo, ſome account of his tranſactions in England, 285, his miniſtry in Spain, 309, he favours the Britiſh intereſt, 316
Walpole, Horatia, eſq. his character, 210
———, ſir Robert, his character, 207, propoſes the exciſe ſcheme, 218, his motives for avoiding a war, 229, &c. motion for removing him from his majeſty's councils and preſence for ever, 237, 238, his power decreaſes, 242, created E. of Orford, 243, enquiry into his conduct, 244, his death, 251
Wampum of the American Indians deſcribed, 435
Wappingers, their treaty with the Britiſh colonies, ibid.
War in general, reflexions on, 386
Warren, commodore, aſſiſts in the reduction of Cape-Breton, 257, he and admiral Anſon defeat a French ſquadron, 270
Warwick, captain, aſſiſts colonel Clive in beating the nabob, 354
Warwickſhire, riots in, 338
Waſhington, colonel, his tranſactions in America, 300, 308
Watſon, admiral, arrives in the Eaſt-Indies, 249, his proceedings there, 354, and death, 355
———, colonel, complimented by prince Ferdinand for his behaviour at Minden, 449
Watts, mr. concerts the plan for depoſing the nabob of Bengal, 354, &c.
Weavers, laws relating to their wages, 341
Webb, general, his operations in America, 329, 352, 353
Weights and meaſures, enquiries about, 381, 421, 464
Wenman, lord viſcount, proceedings concerning his election for Oxfordſhire, 309, &c.
Wentworth, general, ſucceeds to the chief command of the forces in the Weſt-Indies, 238, his proceedings at Carthagena, 239, further account of his operations in the Weſt-Indies, 246
Weſt, admiral, his character, 322, his behaviour in the action with M. de la Galiſſonniere, 323, ſuperſeded, ibid. but graciouſly received, 324, appointed a lord of the admiralty, 348, ſent with a ſquadron to the Weſtward, 351
Weſt-Indies, and the Leeward-Iſlands, tranſactions in, 278, &c. 382, &c. 392, 426, 431, 476, 477
Weſtminſter, account of a remarkable election at, 283, 287, 288, bill for widening ſome of its ſtreets, 339, its bridge deſcribed, ibid. bill for ſupplying it with fiſh, 380, 462
Weſtmoreland, (Fane) earl of, inſtalled chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford, 425
Whale-fiſhery, act for encouraging, 276
Wheels of heavy carriages, an act for regulating, 273, miſcarriage of a bill relating to, 419
Whitmore, general, aſſiſts in the reduction of Louiſbourg, 389, 390
William, ſir Charles Hanbury, the czarina's anſwer to him, 358
———, colonel, detached with a party, 314, killed, ibid.
Wilſon, captain, inſulted by the Dutch, 445, for which he takes vengeance, ibid.
———, captain, complimented by prince Ferdinand for his behaviour at Minden, 449
Winchelſea, (Finch) E. of, his remarks on the bill for the herring-fiſhery, 283
Windows, additional tax on, 356
Winterfield, general, killed at Goerlitz, 368
Wirtemberg, Charles Eugene, duke of, his operations, 356, 365, 449
Wolfe, general, his bravery at Louiſbourg, 389, &c. veſted with the command againſt Quebeck, 438, his manifeſto on the Iſland of Orleans, ibid. takes poſſeſſion of Point-Levi, ibid. encamps by the falls of the river Montmorenci, 439, ſails up the river St. Laurence, ibid. he is repulſed at Montmorenci, ibid. remarks on his ſituation, 448, he calls a council of war, ibid. lands at the heights of Abraham, 441, falls at the battle of Quebeck, ibid. eulogium on him, 442, a monument to his memory addreſſed for by the houſe of commons, 443
Wolfenbuttel.—See Brunſwick
Wool, and woolen yarn, allowed to be imported into England from Ireland, 291, 294
Worge, colonel, commands the forces ſent againſt Goree, 392, left governor Senegal, ibid.
Wright, Fortunatus, his gallantry and death, 326
Wunch, general, retakes Leipzig, and worſts general Haddick at Corbitz, 452
Wynne, ſir Watkin Williams, his character, 215

X.

Xaverius, prince of Saxony, ſent with a re-enforcement to the prince de Soubiſe, 398, he penetrates into the Heſſian and Hanoverian territories, 483

Y.

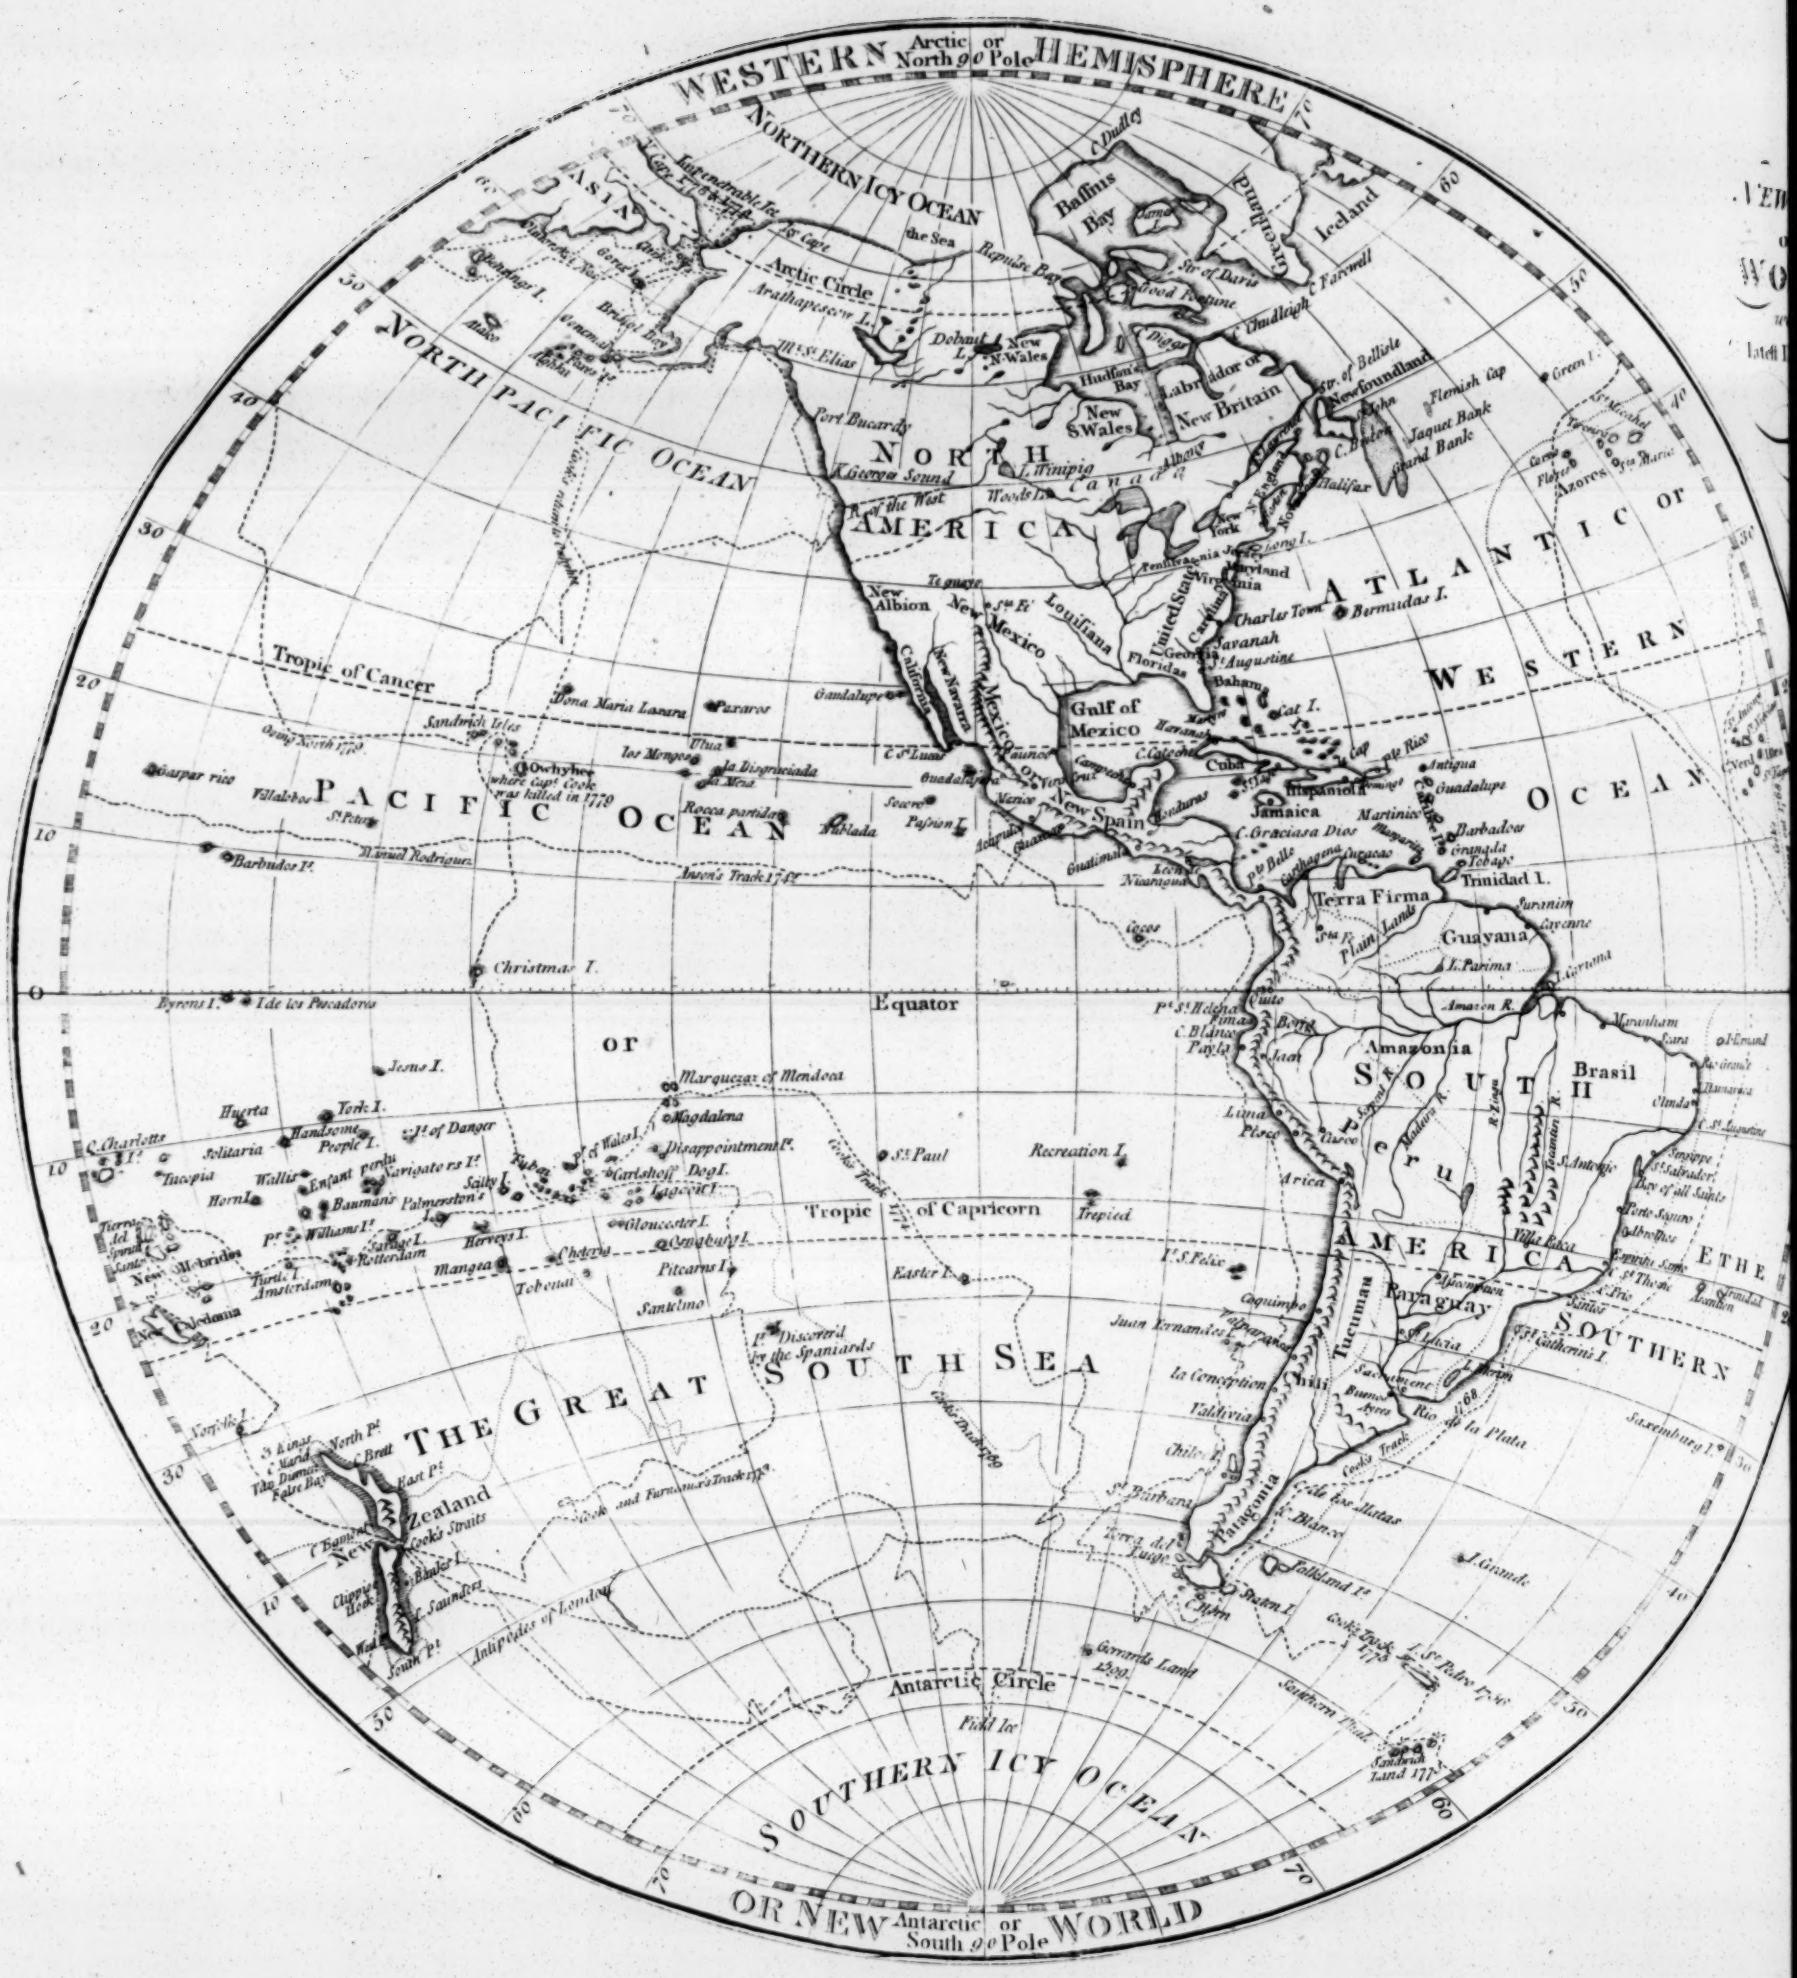
Young, William, his ſpeech for a ſupply, 84, made one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 183, his marriage with Mary Heathcoate diſſolved, 187
Yonge, ſir William, ſome account of, 215
York, Edward, D. of, embarks as a volunteer with lord Howe, 384, titles conferred on him, 478
Yorke, gen. ſir Joſeph, makes a requiſition to the ſtates-general of 6000 troops, 321, preſents a memorial to the Dutch concerning Oſtend and Nieuport, 372, has conferences with the ſtates relative to the ſeiſing of the Dutch ſhips, 387, 409, preſents a memorial concerning the contraband trade carried on by their merchants in favour of France, 454, and concerning the hoſtilities committed by the Dutch in the river of Bengal, 479
——, mr. ſupports the bill for extending the mutiny-act to the Eaſt-India company's ſettlement, 302
Yorkſhire, riots in, 297
Yſenbourg, prince of, defeated by the duke de Broglio at Sangerſhauſen, 398, killed at Bergen, 447

Z.

Zinzendorf, count, his letter to mr. de Palms publiſhed, 199,
Zumjungen, general, employed in Sicily, 125, &c. complaint againſt him, 127, his ſedate temper, ibid. goes and beſieges Meſſina, 128, has a conference with admiral Byng, 131, advances to Palermo, 132
Zell, proceedings of the D. de Richelieu there, 374.—See Hanover
Zittau deſtroyed by the Auſtrians, 366

FINIS.

13 JY 60



Engraved for J. Harrison

...tic as the ice directs. March 24th 1788.

...Sutton & Co 169 Strand

35
30
20
15
10
5
0
5
10
North Cape
Fleiborn Capt
Arctic Circle
ICELAND
Skalholt
Mt Hecla
Reydarfiordur
Cape Stadt
Ferro I.
Shetland Is.
Lerwick
Orkney Is.
Pomona I.
Stavanger
Bergen
Lindenas Cape
Skagen C.
Cattegat
BRITISH OCEAN
DENMARK
IRISH SEA
English Channel
Aberdeen
Edinburgh
Glasgow
Dublin
Cork
Cape Clear
Land's End
Scilly I.
Hamburgh
Hanover
Amsterdam
Rotterdam
Brussels
Paris
Rouen
Caen
Cherbourg
Jersey
Guernsey
Alderney
Ouessant
Brest
St Malo
Quimper
Rennes
Nantes
Bay of BISCAY
Bordeaux
Rochelle
Limoges
Toulouse
Perigueux Tours
Orleans
Paris
Nevers
Dijon
Strasburg
Basel
Zurich
Bern
SWITZERLAND
Geneva
Alps
Turin
Genoa
G. of Genoa
Nice
Marseille
G. of Lyon
Montpellier
Narbonne
Perpignan
Barcelona
Tarragona
Tortosa
Zaragoza
Pamplona
Burgos
Valladolid
Madrid
SPAIN
Salamanca
Toro
Zamora
Leon
Oviedo
Santillana
Bilboa
St Sebastian
Pau
Capbreux
Bayonne
St Martha
Corunna
Santiago
Compostella
Braga
Oporto
Coimbra
Lisbon
C. de Roca
Setubal
Evora
Badajoz
Seville
Cadiz
Str. of Gibraltar
Gibraltar
Tangier
Ceuta
Malaga
Almeria
Carthagena
Murcia
Alicante
Cordova
Granada
Jaen
Cuenca
Saragossa
Majorca
Minorca
Ivica
CORSICA
SARDINIA
Algeri
Cagliari
Bona
Tunis
Oran
Salle
AFRICA
MEDITERRANEAN
Longit. W. from London.
T. Kitchin Del.
Engraved for Jno. Harris

EUROPE,

Drawn from the latest and best

Authorities.

ICY SEA
North Cape
North Kyn Cape
Wardochuus
Porsanger
Kola
Kandalax
Polina
Kolguy I.
Candinos I.
Waygats
Pustozerskoi
Osbroy
Grodish
Mezen R.
Mezen
Mezenskoi Mountains
Petzkora R.
Petzkora Mountains
Archangel
Kouvrol
Werchilskoy
Yarensk
Ca. Pernow
Usting Weliki
Dwina R.
Kem
Sema
Lakta
Povenetz
Kargapol
Schenkers koy
Tolm
Khinow
Wologda
Galitsh
Usther's
Belosero
Petrowskie
Kostroma
Yaroslaw
Nishney
Novogrod
Trefna R.
Kama R.
Wolga R.
Oka R.
Moscow
Peresław
Wolodimer
Don R.
Voronetz
Pawlowsk
Kyrsk
Siewsk
Kursk
Sem R.
Tchernicow
Pultawa
Lampol
Donetz R.
Bakamt
Don R.
Afof
Kuban R.
Sea of Afof
Crim
Kaffa
Balaklawa
Mouths of the Danube
Bielgorod
Ozalow
Precop
Dnieper R.
Dniester R.
Jassi
Bender
Prouth R.
Pruth R.
Bukorest
Silistria
Nicopoli
Widin
Berrowa
Pristin
Orbitello
Sophia
Philippopoli
Adrianopoli
Constantinople
Sea of Marmora
The Bosphorus
Dardanelles
Smyrna
Ephesus
Rhodes
Scarpanto
Santorin
Polycandro
Argentiera
Scio
Sciatho
Scyro
Lemnos
Lesbos
Tenedos
Troy
Gallipoli
Durazzo
Contessa
Salonichi
Embro
Strymon
Trajanopoli
Scutari
Ragusa
Uscup
Kraloro
Servia
Belgrade
Sip
Temes vor
Bats
Karlstadt
Gradisk
Essek
Banalucka
Cemender
Tibitz
Sarayo
Orbitello
Argentiera
Piombino
Rossano
St Severino
Squilace
Cape di Spartivento
Morea
Mistra
Modon
Navarin
Zante
Cephalonia
Durazzo
Otranto
Brindisi
Tarento
B. of Tarento
C. di Leuca
Corfu
Ancona
Rimini
Ravenna
Ferrara
Venice
Trieste
Fiume
Segna
Zara
Spalatro
Narenta R.
Ragusa
Cattaro
Durazzo
Scutari
Durazzo
Black Drin R.
Drin R.
Vistula R.
Cracow
Sendomir
Lemberg
Zaslow
Jaroslaw
Lublin
Belz
Chelm
Brzesk
Czartorisk
Wlodawa
Luck
Mirapel
Kiew
Pultawa
Czerkass
Kylow
Winnica
Bracław
Rudak
Terekan R.
Volga R.
Don R.
Donetz R.
Kuban R.
Afof

ASIA,

Drawn from the Latest and best

AUTHORITIES.

NORTH

EUROPEAN TURKEY

BLACK SEA

Constantinople

Crim

Kuban R.

Azof

Don R.

Volga R.

Astracan

Krasnoyar

CASPIAN SEA

Kaffa

Nova Sembla

Str. of Waygats

White Sea

Archangel

Oldenskoi

Obdorskoi

Obi R.

Berezov

Tiumenskoi

Kuiskoi

Atlimsk

Tobolskoi

Samarovskoi

Surgut

Demianskoi

Tomskoi

Yeniseiskoi

Irkutsk

Nertchinskoi

Selenginskoi

Nertchinsk

Argun R.

Amur R.

Okhotskoi

Kamtschatka

Penschinskoi

Anadirskoi

Kolymskoi

Yakutskoi

Lena R.

Yenisei R.

Ob R.

Irtish R.

Tobol R.

Ural R.

Wolga R.

Kama R.

Viatka R.

Moscow

Wolynskoi

Orlau

Kiowo

Tamensk

Kasan

Saratow

Penza

Simbirsk

Menzelinsk

Tumen

Permskoi

Werkoturskoi

Kungoor

Krasnoyarsk

Irkutsk

Nertchinsk

Selenginsk

Okhotsk

Kamtschatka

Penschinsk

Anadirsk

Kolymsk

Yakutsk

OCEAN
Glacial Prom.
Diomedes I.
St Laurence I.
Joanike I.
Arctic Circle
Anadir R.
Anadirskoi Ostrog
Olutorskoi Ostrog
Ost Kamtschatskoi Ostrog
Verkney Kamtschatskoi Ostrog
Nishney Kamtschatskoi Ostrog
Kamtschatka
Sea of Kamtschatca
Penginskoi Ostrog
Tigilskoi Ostrog
Okolskoi Ostrog
Udskoi Ostrog
Aldan R.
Yakutsk
Olekminskoi Ostrog
Slobeda Kirenska
Kirenskoi Ostrog
Lenskoi Ostrog
Yakutsk
Irkuts
Verkhinsk
Udinsk
Seledinsk
Baikal L.
Selinga R.
Orkon R.
Dalay Nor
Parrakotun
Teidsicar
Niman
Tebasi
Sangar R.
Nimgita
Burgonboten
Purin
Uncheonoo
Sandy Desert or Gobi
EASTERN TARTARY
MONGOLS
Kara Koram
Kukukk
Trat
Kara
Shin yang
Arbai
Yarsban
Pekin
Yellow Sea
Kingkitan
Yang Tse
Sea of Korea
Korea
Oki I.
Sado
Yesso I.
Tacapsi
C. Eroeu
Sangaar Str.
Vambu
C. Kennis
Catsima
Tatsisio
Kinsa I.
Sokoko I.
Yunai I.
Meaco
Japan
Amanl
Kayfong
Sin-gan
Honan
Yangchow
Tsongming
Chusan
Vuchang
Nanchang
Kinchen
Yochow
Kingchow
Linkeang
Panking
Yenpin
Fuchow
Tayan
Quey-yang
Quey-ling
Yunan
Kyangsi
Kyangnan
Kuntai
Kanchow
Amoy
Pouhu
Basbi I.
Formosa I.
Tropic of Cancer
Lekeyo I.
Kindobin
Pinnacle I.
Prima
Pasan
Anatachan
Tinian
Guhon
Bolls
Farallon
Patos
St Juan
Malabrigo
MARIANA I.
Kiuchow
Kwangtung
Kwangsi
Tonquin
Gulf of Tonquin
Hainan I.
Tinkin
Yay
Kesay
Faifo
Kemoy
Cochin China
Cambodia
CAMBODIA
CHAMPA
Siam
Gulf of Siam
Andaman Islands
Nicobar Isles
Junselon
Malacca
Malacca Str.
Natuna
Tsiang
Borneo
BORNEO
Pulo Timon
Lei Portune
Nassau I.
Banca
Sincapore
Str. of Sincapore
Pulo Aor
Pulo Pinang
Benjarmassen
Celebes
CELEBES
Macassar
Ora
Salayer
Boutan
MOLO
Cumbaya
Java
Isles of Sunda
Batavia
Sunda Str.
Timor
Timorland
Pulo Laut
Laos
Siam
Ava
Pegu
Arakan
Bengal
Andaman Islands
Nicobar Isles
Philippine Islands
Luconia I.
Manilla
Mindoro
Panay
Sanar I.
Leyta I.
Parago I.
Min danao
Jolo
Basilan
Sooloo I.
Gilolo I.
Morotai
Sanguin
Sapo
Celebes
Ceram
Spice Isles
New Guinea
Arru Isles
Timorland
Pulo Condore
Cape Romania
Cape Comorin
Ceylon
Maldivia
Laccadives
Mahe
Calicut
Goa
Surat
Persian Gulf
Ormus
Muscat
Arabia
Mocha
Red Sea
Babelmandel Str.
Socotra I.
Aden
Abyssinia
Africa
Madagascar
Mozambique
Sofala
Natal
Cape of Good Hope
Table Bay
Cape Agulhas
Saldanha Bay
Falso C.
Diemens Land
Van Diemens Land
Tasmania
New Zealand
New Holland
Terra Australis
Engraved by C. Terry.
95
100
105
110
115
120
130
135
140
5
0
5
10
15
20
25
30
35
40
45
50
55

BRITISH 13 JU
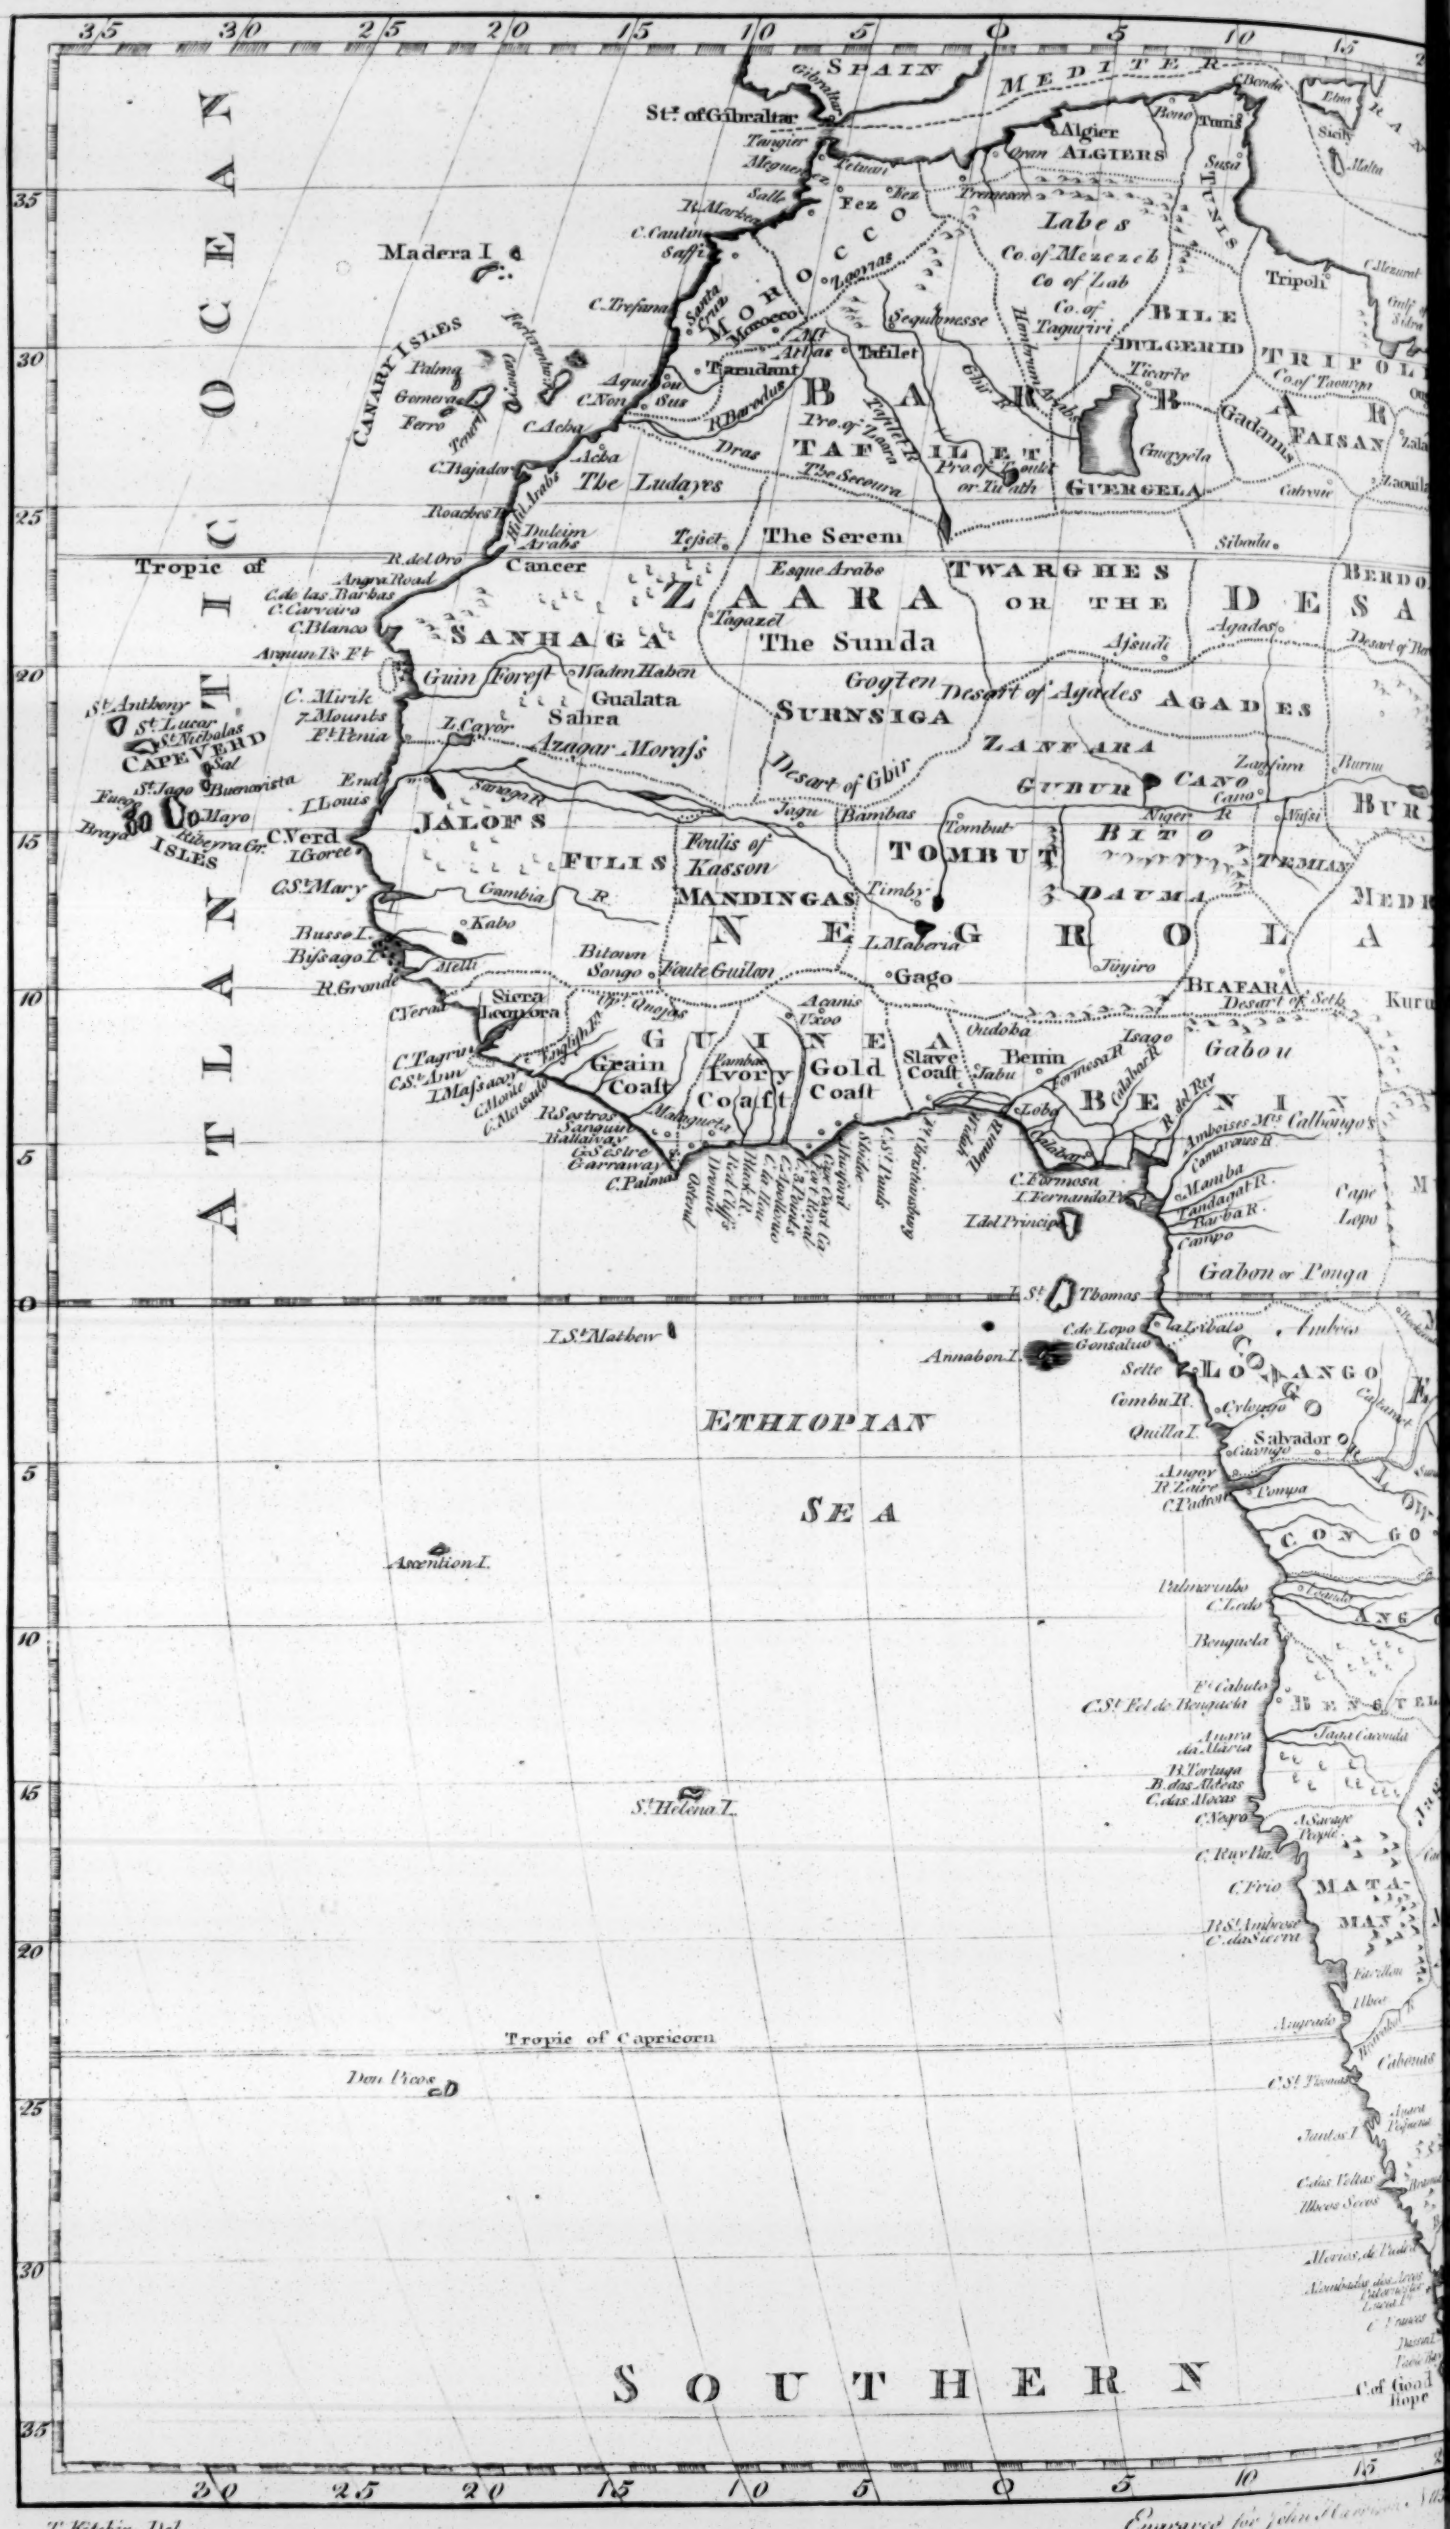
MUSEU



ATLANTIC OCEAN
ETHIOPIAN SEA
SOUTHERN SPAIN
MEDITER.
St.r of Gibraltar
Gibraltar
Algier
Oran ALGIERS
Tunis
Bona
Tripoli
Malta
Sicily
Madera I.d
CANARY ISLES
Palma
Gomera
Ferro
Teneriffe
Canaria
Fuerteventura
MOROCCO
Fez
Mequinez
Tangier
Tetuan
Salle
Mt Marbeta
C. Cantin
Saffi
C. Trefana
Santa Cruz
Morocco
Mt Atlas
Tafilet
Tarudant
Aguz ou Sus
C. Non
R. Berdoa
C. Acha
Acha
C. Bajador
Roaches
Wild Arabs
Duleim Arabs
The Ludayes
Dras
Tegaza
Labes
Co. of Mezeeh
Co of Lab
Co. of Taguriri
Sequinesse
Hoshmum Arabs
BILEDULGERID
Tiarite
Gadamis
Gauryela
GUERGELA
Fezzan
TRIPOLI
Co. of Taourga
Sibadu
Cabrone
Tropic of Cancer
R. del Oro
Angra Road
C. de las Barbas
C. Carvairo
C. Blanco
Arguin Is.ds
SANHAGA
The Serem
Teffet
Esque Arabs
TWARGHES OR THE ZAARA
Tagazel
The Sunda
Ajsudi
Agades
DESA
Desart of Agades
AGADES
Gogten
SURNSIGA
ZANFARA
Desart of Gbir
GUBUR
CANO
Cano
Zanfara
Burnu
Bambas
Tombut
Niger R.
Wassi
BITO
TOMBUT
TEMIAN
DAUMA
MEDI
Timbo
Foulis of Kasson
MANDINGAS
FULIS
JALOFS
Senega R.
Gambia R.
Kabo
Busse I.
Bissago I.
Melli
R. Grande
C. Verd
I. Goree
C.S.t Mary
St Anthony
St Lucar
St Nicholas
CAPE VERD
Sal
St Iago
Buenavista
Fuego
Mayo
Brava
Liberra Gr.
ISLES
C. Mirik
Mounts
Ft Penia
Guin Forest
Wadem Haben
Gualata
Sahra
Azuggar Morass
L. Cayor
End
L. Louis
L. Mabera
Timbo
Gago
Tinyiro
BIAFARA
Desart of Sets
Kuru
Sierra Leonora
C. Verd
C. Tagrin
C.S.t Ann
I. Massacre
C. Monte Alegre
R. Sestros
Sangwin
Ballaway
G.o Estre
Barraway
C. Palmas
Mt Apollonia
Agonis
Vxoo
Grain Coast
Ivory Coast
Gold Coast
Slave Coast
Benin
Jabu
Ardra
Formosa R.
Calabar R.
Lobo
Bonny R.
R. del Rey
BENIN
Gabon
Amboises
Mts Callongos
Camaranes R.
Mamba
Tandagat R.
Barba R.
Campo
C. Formosa
I. Fernando Po
I. del Principe
Cape Lopo
Gabon or Ponga
I. St Thomas
C. de Lopo Gonsalvo
I. St Matthew
Annabon I.
Settc
Gombu R.
Quilla I.
Loango
Cabenda
Salvador
Angoy
R. Zaire
C. Padron
Pemba
CONGO
Benguela
C. St Fel. de Benguela
Ascention I.
St Helena I.
Tropic of Capricorn
Don Roos
C. Rux Pta.
C. Frio
MATA-MA
Cabenda
C. of Good Hope
T. Kitchin Del.
Engraved for John Cary

Africa,

Drawn from the lateſt and beſt,

AUTHORITIES.

ANATOLIA
Greece
Candia
Cyprus
Aleppo
C. Gata
Sydon
Jeruſalem
Alexandria
C. Rosat
C. Brule
Luco
BARCA
Tibah
El'aqh
Mt
Girze
Cairo
Suez
Arſa
Gaza
Girge
Aiat
Ainsais
Lamule
EGYPT
Harque
Cosir
Esouan
Syene
Gr. Cataract
Medina
Mecca
Red Sea
Arabian Gulf
Gaud Ter.
I. de Curia Muria
Kaou
LEVATA
Little Cataract
Nubasses
Derra
Bugiens
Kenus
NUBIA
Kayar
Mocbo
Desart of Nubia
Dongola
Fungi
Barber
GAUGA
Ganga
Ganga L.
Derkut
Balous
Sennar
Dambea
Gondar
Dambea L.
Tigra
Bageinder
Head of the Nile
White R.
Blue R.
GORHAM
ABASSIA
Amare
Kesen
Danakil
Str. of Babelmandel
Mocca
Aden
Salt Mines
Mt Mendale
Zeila
C. Guardafui
Socotora I.
2 Sisters
Abdelcuri
C. de Orsin
Goada
Bandal de Agoa
Torrezella
Badris
Negro's B.
Pustu Matinga
ADEL
Desart coast
AJAN
Balli
Hawache R.
Pega
Lamria L.
Fatagar
Biziamo
Narea
Mts of Gauca
Rodway
Saspara
Cambat
Magnadava R.
Mac
Residence of the King
GALLA
Bida
JINJIRO
ALAOBA
The Cajaros
Arbores
MAGADOXA
Brava
Dubo
C. Basas
Bundal
INDIAN
Equinoctial Line
Rock to Mosequitos
Angaza
Mt
Mombaſa
Melinda
Mantol
KOKO OR NZIKO
The Jages
Anthropophages
or Man Eaters
Monsoes
Fungano
Melinda
C. Formoſa
I. Pate
I. Lamo
C. de Juan Mola
I. Pemba
I. Zanzabar
C. Falso
R. Rugbo
I. Monfia
C. del Gada
Melinde
Mombaſa
Mozambique
Meriavi
Mumbos
Prof. the Zimbas
Sacomba
Chicova
Abutua
Gold Mines
MATRUCA
Inhamior
Tete or San Jago
Rede Guana
Baeta
Convent of Dominicans
MONOMOTAPA
Quelere
Monomotapa
Sofala
Limbaye
Manica
Gold Mines
Sedanda
Sofala
R. St Maria
St Sebaſtian
C. Corrientes
Rod. Spirito Santo
Bajaral
Ferd
Chauvea
Mozambique
Channel
St Juan
Mansiadey
Les Sedores
St Vincent
Pte St Jago
Juan L.
Dava
MADAGASCAR I.
Bruce
B. St Auguſtin
Nasumento I.
C. St Maria
Fansberg
B. of Antongil
I. Ibrahim or St Maria
Ivone Pt
Antibate
Mauguerone
C. Lamaraffi
Antavara
Itapoule
Manangara
Manatanga
Anambole
Pte Dauphin
C. Romain
Mauritius I.
Ley Bourbon or Maſcarin
Diego Reis
Das Garacos
Ide Sable
St John of Lisbon
Baxos del Paleram de Perez dos Bambos
Amirante Is.
St Francisco
Francisco Alphonse
OCEAN
St Miguel
St Juan de Nueva
C. Selvas Bum
I. Aſtova
La Malba
Banks of Nazareth
C. Natao
Boamarro
Comora
Fairimbo Fort.
Moelia
Johanna
St Chriſtopher
Abutua
Gold Mines
Inhamior
Tete or San Jago
Rede Guana
Baeta
Convent of Dominicans
MONOMOTAPA
Quelere
Monomotapa
Sofala
Limbaye
Manica
Gold Mines
Sedanda
Sofala
R. St Maria
St Sebaſtian
C. Corrientes
Rod. Spirito Santo
Bajaral
Ferd
R. Vembe or Lake
Babel Agoa
L. St Maria
Inhagua
Chamvuquas
Chamvuquas
HOTTENTOTS
B. St Lucia
C. des Pescadores
Terra dos Naonetas
B. de Natal
Stephens Pt
R. St Chriſtopher
Sonqua
B. de Algoa
OCEAN

Engraved by G. Terry.

Newgate ſtreet. Aug.t 31.t 1787.

North America
Drawn from the lateſt and beſt Authorities.

Longitude West from London.

Arctic Circle

These Parts are unknown

NEW NORTH WALES

Christinaux

and of the Afsiniboils

WESTERN SEA

NEW ALBION

Teguayo & Quivira

Snowy Mountains

The Head of this River is unknown

Black Padoucas

White Padoucas

Panimaha

Kansez

Apaches of Seven Rivers.

Apacheria

Cocomari

Copias

Gulf of California

New Biſcay

NEW LEON

Panuco

Culiacan

Sinaloa

Real of Frayles

Real Nuevo

Parral

Saneca

Durango

Cibuatlan

Culiacan

Chiametlan

Fisher's R.

C. St Lucar

Blue Mts

Snake

Red R.

Mississippi R.

Red L.

Pikes R.

Bourbon R.

Bourbon Lake

Meadows Lake

Great Meadows

Quinipique L.

Pt. Maurepas

Pt. Bourbon

Village

Fondalac

Pt. Charles

Pikes Lake

Mantons R.

Assiniboils R.

Mountain of bright Stones.

River of the West

Discovered by Juan de Fuca

Discovered by Aguilar

Discovered by Francis Drake Anno 1578

Carmel R.

Colorado R.

Rio Grande

Nueces R.

R. Bravo

R. Palmas

Caouita

Esnoval

Panis

Osages

Missouris

Engraved for Jno. Harrison's Atlas

T. Kitchin Del.

BAFFINS BAY
Cumberland I.
Eftimeaux
Repulse Bay
C. Hope
Wager Bay
Strait Duerfort
North Main
C. King Charles
Good Fortune I.
Fretum Hudson
C. Elizabeth
Resolution Is.
Chesterfield Inlet
Barren L.
Nottingham I.
Hudsons Straits
C. Dudley
Rocks
Rankins Inlt
Mansolet I.
C. Hope
C. Walsingham
Hopes B.
Saddle Is.
C. Southampton
HUDSONS
Very Doubtfull Sea.
Davis's Inlt
St Anns B.
Esquimaux B.
BAY
Bakers Dozen
C. Tatham
Wt Penns Mt
Warwers Is.
Richmond Ft
Esquimaux
LABRADOR OR
NEW BRITAIN
Plumbers Factory
Cubbs
NEW SOUTH WALES
Albany R.
Henley Albany Ft
Christinaux Lake
Moose Ft
Peregy R.
Northern Mountains
Lake Acmipigon
Lake Sauteur
Lake Superior
Outabuas
Lake Huron
Outagamis
Sakis
Lake Erie
Mascoutens
Miamis
Pickanillances
Buffaloes Meadows
Mines
Missouris
Osages
Cherakees
Chicasaws
Akansas
SOUTH CAROLINA
Creek Indians
Chactaws
Mobile
Pensacola
WEST FLORIDA
New Orleans
Mississippi
North Cape
GULF OF MEXICO
Cape Florida
Bahama Straits
LUCAYOS or BAHAMA Is Grenoa Bay
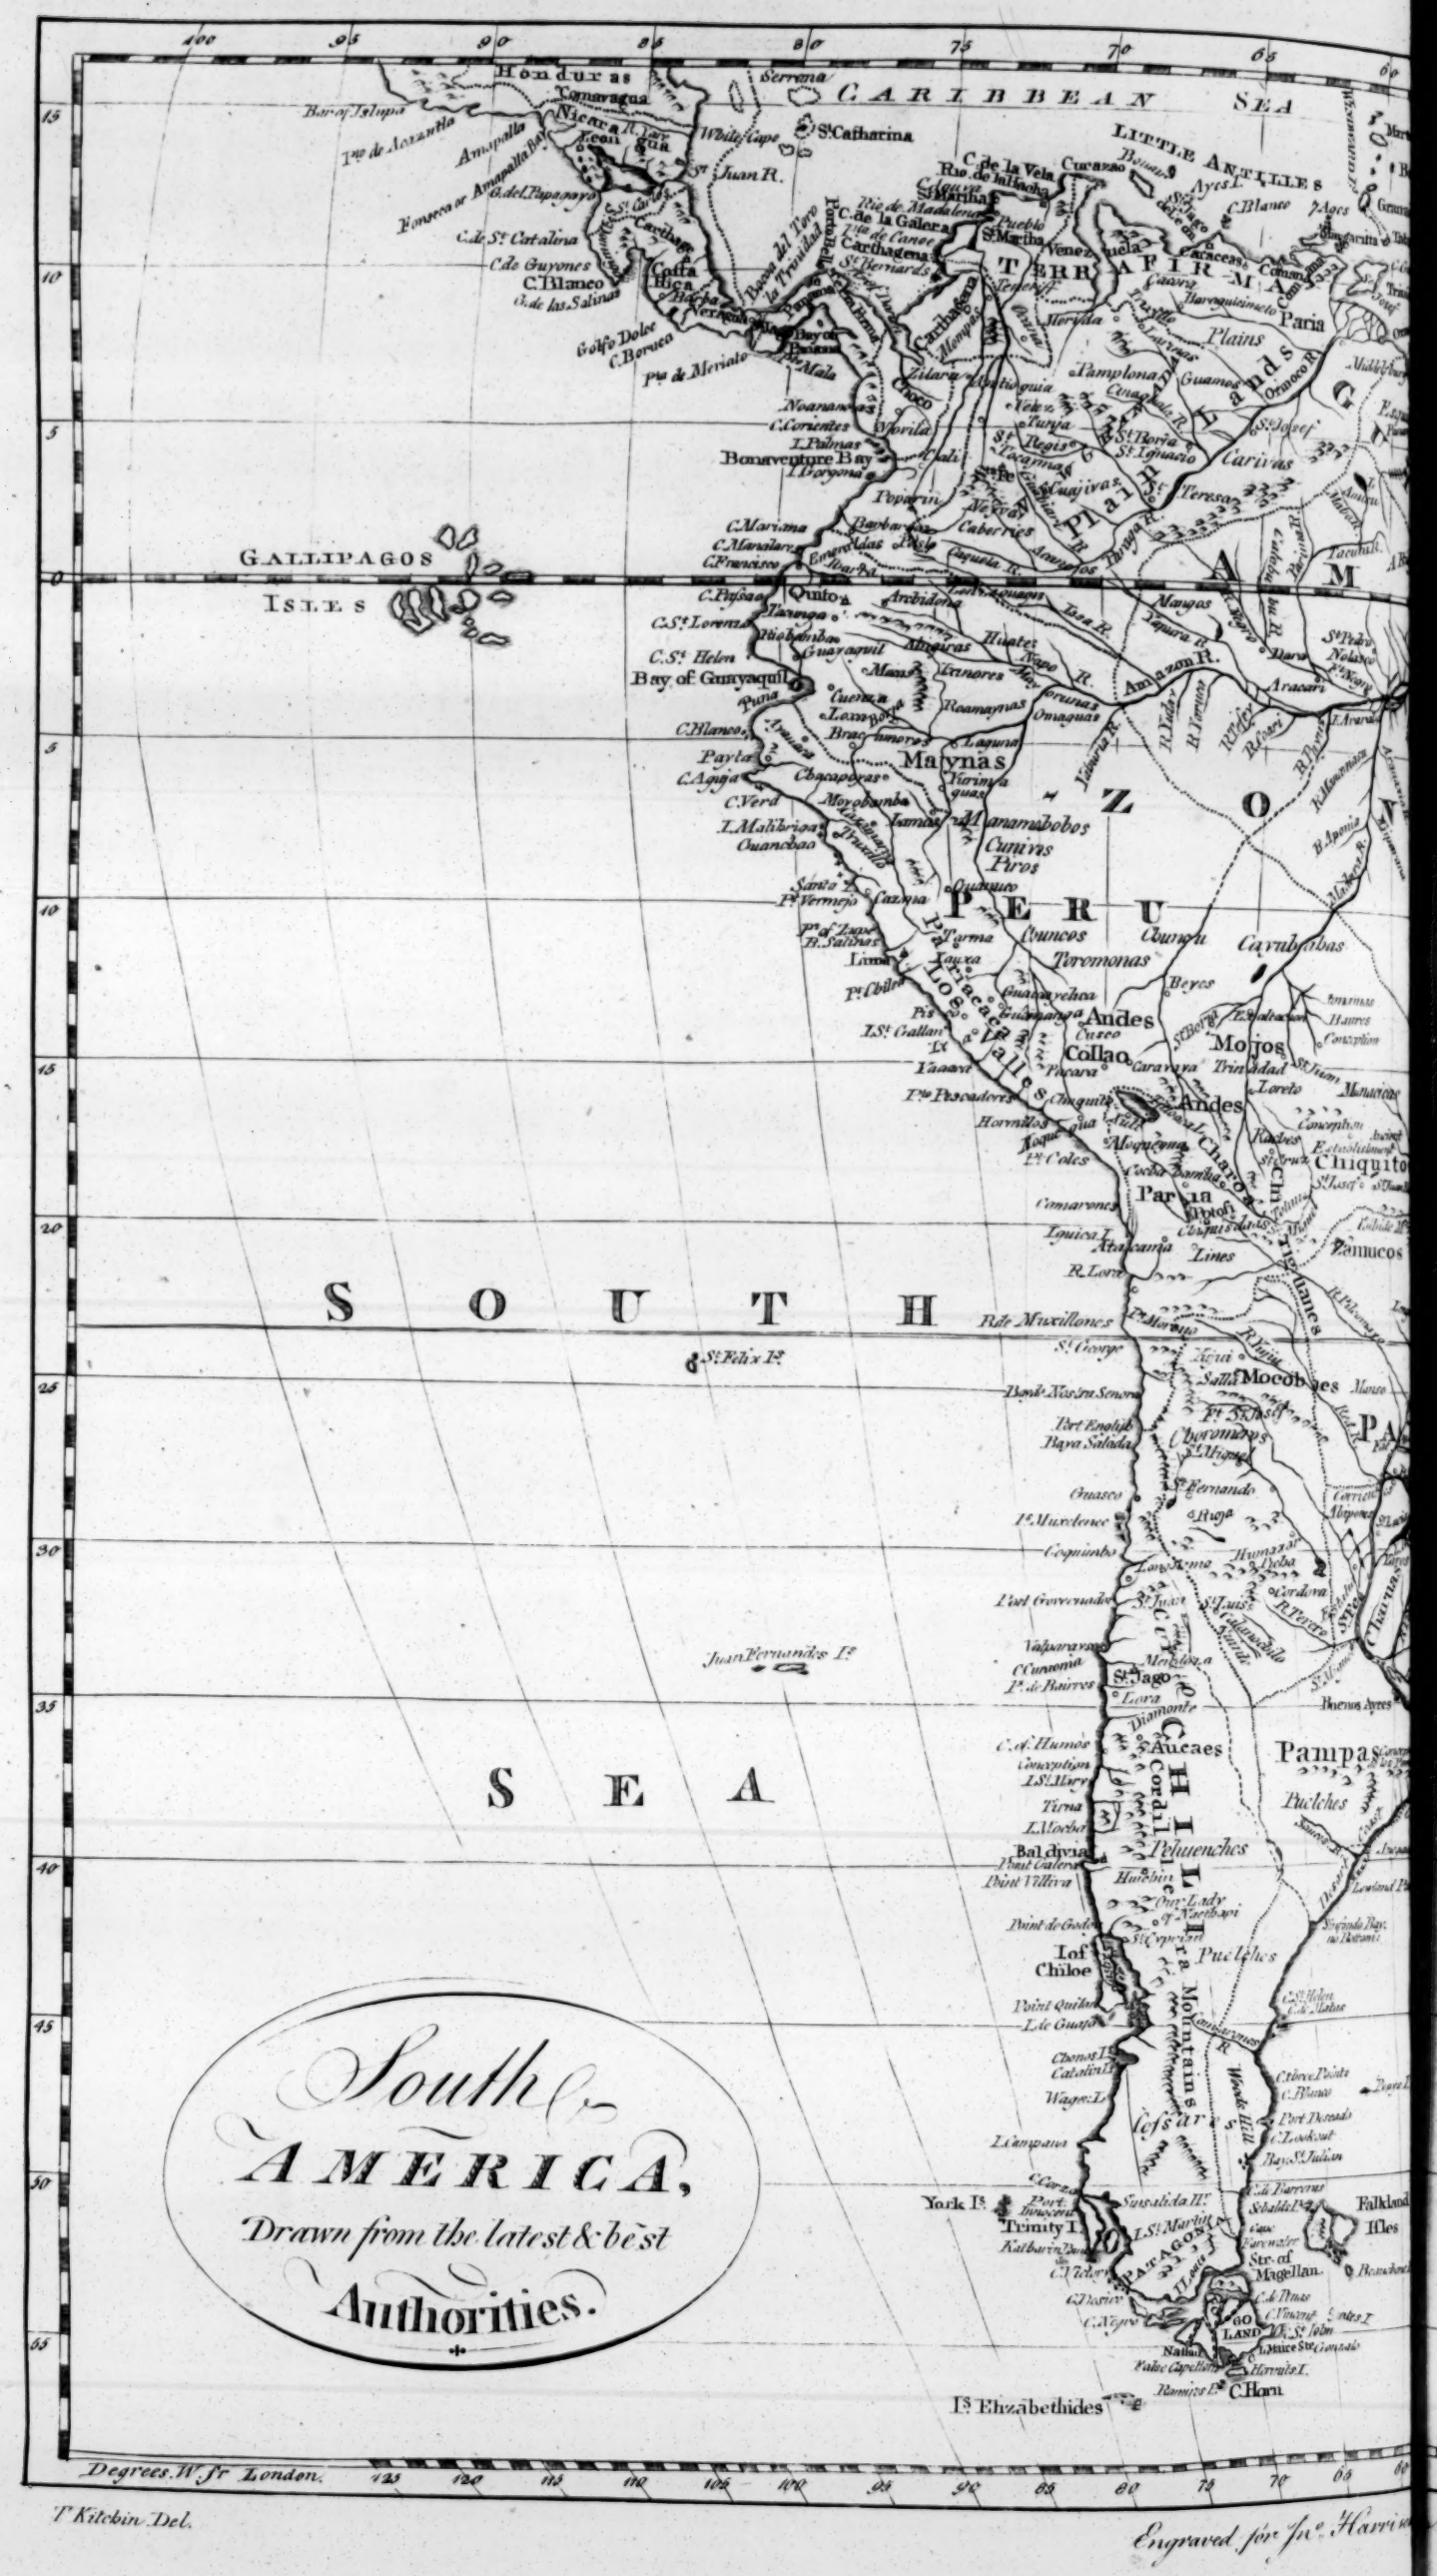
Whale Chan.
Lucayo I.
the Hole in the Rock
Providence
Eleuthera
Ship Chan.
Cat I.
Andros
Tropic of Cancer.
ATLANTIC OCEAN
GREENLAND
C. Farewell
Cumberland Str.
Mt Raw leigh.
C. of Gods Mercy.
Fretum Davis
Cumberland Str.
Resolution I.
Frobisher Bay
Meta Incognita
Lady Hills
Frobisher Str.
Hudsons Str.
Very Doubtfull Sea.
Proposed limits of Hudsons Bay.
Jonakannaks
Davis's Inlt
St Anns B.
Esquimaux B.
Esquimaux
LABRADOR OR
NEW BRITAIN
C. Charles
Bell Ile Straits
Qairpon I.
White B.
Penguin I.
C. Bonavista
Trinity B.
C. Race
Great Bank
Richmond Ft
Esquimaux
Pambyar L.
St Johns R.
Studie R.
Factory
Mt Studock Mistaken Ft
Perrilz L.
Tapperts Ft.
Cubbs
Plumbers Factory.
NEW SOUTH WALES
Albany R.
Henley Albany Ft
Christinaux Lake
Moose Ft
Peregy R.
Northern Mountains
Lake Acmipigon
Lake Sauteur
Lake Superior
Outabuas
Lake Huron
Outagamis
Sakis
Lake Erie
Mascoutens
Miamis
Pickanillances
Buffaloes Meadows
Mines
Missouris
Osages
Cherakees
Chicasaws
Akansas
SOUTH CAROLINA
Creek Indians
Chactaws
Mobile
Pensacola
WEST FLORIDA
New Orleans
Mississippi
North Cape
GULF OF MEXICO
Cape Florida
Bahama Straits
LUCAYOS or BAHAMA Is
Gen

BRITISH
13 JY60
MUSEUM

BRITISH
15 JY60
MUSEUM



Honduras
Truxillo
Bay of Islupa
Pto de Alexandria
Amapalla
Amapalla Bay
Fonseca or Amapalla Bay
C. del Papagayo
C. de Guyones
C. Blanco
C. de las Salinas
Golfo Dolce
C. Bonica
Pto de Mariato
GALLIPAGOS
ISLES
C. Pinsas
C. St. Lorenzo
C. St. Helen
Bay of Guayaquil
C. Blanco
Payta
C. Aguja
C. Verd
I. Malabriga
Guanchaco
Pt. Vermejo
Pt. de Lupas
B. Salinas
Lima
Pt. Chilca
Is. St. Gallan
Pt. Pescadores
Hormillos
Pt. Coles
Ilo
Pt. Morenos
St. George
St. Felix I.
Juan Fernandez I.
Valparaiso
Cuntonia
Pt. de Ruirres
St. Jago
Lora
C. of Humos
Conception
Is. St. Mary
Tirua
L. Morchat
Baldivia
Point Galera
Point Villeva
Huichin
Point de Godes
Is. of Chiloe
Point Quilan
L. de Guapi
Chonos I.
Catalina I.
Wager L.
L. Campana
York Is.
Trinity I.
Cape Desire
C. Negro
Is. Elizabethides
C. Horn
Ramirez I.
Hermite I.
Nassau
Valde Capellan
Str. of Magellan
Falkland Isles
Buenos Ayres
Pampas
Puelches
Patagonia
Mountains
Andes
Cordilleras
Peruvian Andes
Parima
Plains
Llanos
Terra Firma
Caribbean Sea
Little Antilles
Curaçao
Bonaventure Bay
Gulf of Darien
Bay of Panama
Carthagena
Cape de la Vela
Rio de la Hacha
Santa Marta
Puerto Cabello
La Guayra
Caracas
Coro
Maracaibo
Merida
Truxillo
Barquisimeto
Paria
Orinoco R.
Cumana
Cumanacoa
Cariaco
Barcelona
Guiana
Amazon R.
Quito
Guayaquil
Lima
Arica
Cusco
Potosi
Chuquisaca
Oruro
Paraguay R.
Buenos Ayres
Mocobues
Chiquito
Peruvian Andes
Cordilleras
Chile
Peruvian Andes
Andes
Mojos
Moxos
Paraguay
Tucuman
Parana R.
Uruguay R.
Rio de la Plata
Rio Negro
Rio Colorado
Rio Grande
Rio Tinto
Rio Sauce
Rio Salado
Rio Dulce
Rio Tercero
Rio Quarto
Rio Primero
Rio Segundo
Rio Xarayes
Rio Pilcomayo
Rio Vermejo
Rio Bermejo
Rio Madeira
Rio Negro
Rio Yapura
Rio Jupura
Rio Iça
Rio Napo
Rio Putumayo
Rio Tunguragua
Rio Pastaza
Rio Morona
Rio Huallaga
Rio Ucayale
Rio Apurimac
Rio Beni
Rio Mamore
Rio Guapore
Rio Itenez
Rio Paraguay
Rio Tapajos
Rio Xingu
Rio Topayos
Rio Negro
Rio Branco
Rio Parima
Rio Caroni
Rio Apure
Rio Meta
Rio Guaviare
Rio Yupura
Rio Putumayo
Rio Napo
Rio Tigre

ATLANTIC

OCEAN

SOUTHERN

OCEAN

CAPE VERD Is.

C. Verd

AFRICA

Equinoctial Line

Tropic of Capricorn

Sapinam
Amanibo
Manemanori
Cayenne I. & T.
C. Orange
Mariz Creek
Is. Marasa
North Cape
Is. Curuo
Macapa
Curiuna I.
Hilara
C. Nassos
Maccayo R.
Maniqiuba
Is. St. John
Corsa Grande
Recife
St. Luis de Maranham
Tupinambas
R. Tocantins
R. Mandahu
Seara
Tortuga Pt.
Sandy Pt.
Fort St. Lucar
C. Corso
Bank of St. Roque
Fernandez I.
C. St. Roque
Village of Saltworks
Rio Grande
Paraiba
Pernambuco
Tamarica
C. St. Augustin
Cachoeira
Olinda
Tapayos
Tapuyma
R. St. Francis
St. Isabella
R. Real
Salvador
Bay of all Saints
Os Ilheos
Provasoa velha
Punta Gorda
Jesuit Rocks
Barra Abrolhos
Rios Magos
Abrolhos
Trinidad I.
Porcupha
C. St. Thomas
Ide. St. Ann
Cape Frio
Ilha Grand
St. Vincent
Canavea I.
Superahu
Anhatcari
Tapocorroi R.
St. Catharine I.
I. Reparo
Porracao
Port St. Peter
I. Mangaveira
Flat
Coast of St. Miguel
Castillos
Capes St. Mary
River of Plate
C. St. Antony
Saxemburg I.
Tristan de Cunha
Alvarez
Terra Australis
Cuyaba
Aldea
Arraial da Assumption
Portal de St. Luis
Paratesa
Carmo
Cuiaba
Coxipo
Palma R.
Cordoza
Coxipo
Villa Rica
Tapicuru
Pitinga
Arinos
Tapajos R.
Water Falls
Arraial de Porale
Araguari R.
R. Parnahiba R.
R. Tocantins
R. Grand
R. Tapajos
R. Tocayo
R. Paraguay
R. Pitinga
R. Arinos
R. Tapicuru
R. Rio Negro
R. Madeira
R. Topayos
R. Xingu
R. Araguari
R. Parnahiba
R. Grand
R. Tocantins
R. Paraguay
R. Tocayo
R. Pitinga
R. Arinos
R. Tapicuru
R. Rio Negro
R. Madeira
R. Topayos
R. Xingu
R. Araguari
R. Parnahiba

Longit. E. from London

N. 113 Newgate Street. Oct.r 1.st 1787.

Engraved by G. Terry

A List of the Copper-Plate Prints, with the Pages where they are to be placed by the Binder, and referred to by the Reader.

N. B. R. Stands Rapin, T. for Tindal, &c.

A

ANNE, queen, T. Vol. I. 340.
Alfred the Great, king, R. Vol. I. 82.
Addiſon, Joſeph, eſq. T. Vol. I. 69.
Anne, of Denmark, queen of James I. R. Vol. II. 364.
Argyle, John duke of, T. Vol. II. 44.
Anne, queen, great ſeal of, T. Vol. I. 340.
Aſia, map of, end of T. Vol. II.
Africa, ditto, ditto.
America, North, ditto.
Ditto, South, ditto.

B

Britons, ancient, to face the preface.
Bacon, ſir Francis, R. Vol. II. 416.
Bacon, ſir Nicholas, ditto, 276.
Byng, George, T. Vol. II. 111.
Bedford, John duke of, R. Vol. I. 493.
Blenheim-houſe, T. Vol. I. 429.
Boyne, battle of, ditto, 90.

C

Catharine of Arragon, R. Vol. II. 46.
Cleves, Anne of, ditto, 193.
Cecil, William lord Burleigh, ditto, 287.
Cottington, Francis lord, ditto, 824.
Chaucer, Geoffrey, R. Vol. I. 466.
Clarke, D. D. Samuel, T. Vol. II. 15.
Charles I. king, R. Vol. II. 410.
Cromwell, Oliver, ditto, 614.
Cromwell, Thomas, ditto, 176.
Clarendon, counteſs of, ditto, 1002.
Canute, king, the Dane, R. Vol. I. 107.
Charles II. ditto, R. Vol. II. 804.
Chronological Table of the ſeven kingdoms of the Anglo Saxons, R. Vol. I. 35.
Chaple of king Henry V. end of the reign.
Common-Wealth, great ſeal of, R. Vol. II. 803.
Charles, king, his death-warrant, ditto, 706.

D

Denmark, George prince of, T. Vol. I. 341.
Dryden, John, R. Vol. II. 976.
Digby, George lord, ditto, 913.
Drake, ſir Francis, ditto, 338.
Devereux, Robert earl of Eſſex, ditto, 365.
Defeat of the French fleet off Belleiſle, under the command of Conflans, T. Vol. II. 471.
——of monſieur de la Clue, ditto, 427.
——of the brave capt. Tyrrel, ditto, 278.
——of the famous Thurot's ſquadron off the Iſle of Man, ditto, 428.

E

Edward III. king, R. Vol. I. 370.
Edward IV. king, ditto, 557.
Edward, black prince, R. Vol. I. 382.
Egbert, king of the Saxons, ditto, 52.
Elizabeth, queen, R. Vol. II. 275.
Edward, VI. king, ditto, 228.
Eſſex, counteſs of, ditto, 408.
Edward V. king, ditto, 3.
Edward II. king, R. Vol. I. 358.
Edward I. king, ditto, 329.
Elizabeth, queen of Bohemia, R. Vol. II. 407.
England, Ireland and Scotland, map of, R. Vol. I. 1
Europe, map of, end of T. Vol. II.

F

Fleetwood, lieutenant-general, R. Vol. II. 826.
François, the glorious action of, October 21, 1757, ditto, 382.

G

Glouceſter, William duke of, T. Vol. I. 246.
Gaunt, John duke of, R. Vol. I. 403.
Garth, M. D. ſir Samuel, T. Vol. II. 201.
Grafton, ducheſs of, T. Vol. I. 730.
George I. king, T. Vol. II. 3.
Genealogical Table of the kings of Eſſex, R. Vol. I. 46.
—— of the royal family of Scotland, R. Vol. II 462.
——of the poſterity of James I. do.
——of Wm. the Conqueror, do. 164.
George I. king, great ſeal of, T. Vol. II. 1.

H

Henry, prince of Wales, R. Vol. II. 407.
Henry V. king, R. Vol. I. 466.
Howard, Thomas, ditto, 310.
Hampden, John. R. Vol. II. 524.
Handel, George Frederick, T. Vol. II. 425.
Hide, Laurence, T. Vol. I. 124.
Howard, Thomas earl of Arundel, R. Vol. II. 480.
Henry III. king, R. Vol I. 272.
Henry VIII. king, ditto, 74.
Henry, lord Darnley king of Scotland, R. Vol. II. 296
Henry VI. king, R. Vol. I. 493.
Henry I. king, ditto, 173.
Henry VII. king, R. Vol. II. 23.
Henry IV. king, R. Vol. I. 447.
Hamilton, George, T. Vol. I. 711.
Henry II. king, R. Vol. I. 202.
Henry, duke of Glouceſter, R. Vol. II. 852.

J

Johnſon, Ben. ditto, 461.
John, king, R. Vol. I. 236.
James I. king, R. Vol. II. 385.
James II. king, ditto, 977.

L

Lauderdale, John duke of, ditto, 886.
Lambert, lieutenant-general, ditto, 780.
Locke, John eſq. T. Vol. I. 212.

M

Mary, queen, ditto, 23.
Mordaunt, Charles, ditto, 426.
Morice, ſir William, R. Vol. II. 882.
Morton, James earl of, ditto, 305.
Milton, John, ditto, 909.
Marlborough, Sarah ducheſs of, T. Vol. I. 340.
Marlborough, John duke of, ditto, 99.
Mary, queen of Scotland, R. Vol. II. 206.
Mancheſter, ducheſs of, T. Vol. I. 637.
Mary I. queen. R. Vol. II. 252.
Monument of queen Elizabeth, ditto, 383.
——— of king John, R. Vol. I. 255.
——— of king Henry, II. and Richard I. ditto, 221.
——— of Mary queen of Scotland, R. Vol. II. 406.
——— of king Edward, R. Vol. I. 576.
——— of king Richard I. ditto, 467.
——— of king Henry V.
Minden, battle of, T. Vol. II. 448.
Monmouth of 64 guns, taking the Foydroyant of 84, ditto, 383.

N

Nottingham, Daniel earl of, T. Vol. I. 29.
Newton, ſir Iſaac, T. Vol. II. 101.

O

Otway, Thomas, R. Vol. II. 976.
Oxford, Robert earl of, T. Vol. II. 243.

P

Pope, Alexander, eſq. ditto, 201.
Plans of the principal ſeaport towns in Ireland, T. Vol. I. 52.

R

Rapin De Thoyras, R. Vol. I. to face the title page
Ruſſel, Francis, R. Vol. II. 294.
Ruſſel, Edward, T. Vol. I. 256.
Richard II. king, R. Vol. I. 418.
Ruſſel, William, lord, R. Vol. II. 964.
Richard III. king, R. Vol. I. 11.
Renelagh, counteſs of, T. Vol. I. 730.
Richard I. king, R. Vol. I. 222.

S

Saville, George marquis of Hallifax, T. Vol. I. 182
Sunderland, Charles earl of, T. Vol. II. 106.
Seymour, Edward duke of Somerſet, R. Vol. II. 230.
Somers, John lord, T. Vol. I. 260.
Smith, ſir Thomas, R. Vol. II. 306.
Sydenham, M. D. Thomas, T. Vol. II. 201.
Shakeſpear, William, R. Vol. II. 380.
Schomburg, Frederick duke of, T. Vol. I. 90.
Stephen, king, R. Vol. I. 182.
Steel, ſir Richard, T. Vol. I. 669.
Spain, Philip king of, R. Vol. II. 262.

T

Talbot, Charles lord, ditto, 176.
Thurlow, John, ditto, 824.
Tindal, Nicholas, to face title of Vol. I. of Tindal.
Talmaſh, lieutenant-general, ditto, 166.
Tillotſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, ditto, 113.
Temple, ſir William, R. Vol. II. 893.

V

Villers, George duke of Buckingham, ditto, 412.

W

William III. king, T. Vol. I. 23.
Wharton, Thomas marquis of, T. Vol. II. 20.
Williams, archbiſhop of, R. Vol. II. 113.
Wolſey, cardinal, ditto, 57.
Waynfleet, William biſhop of Wincheſter, R. Vol. I. 575.
William II. ſurnamed Rufus, R. Vol. I. 165.
Wales, princeſs of, T. Vol. II. 225.
William, king, the Conqueror, R. Vol. I. 147.
Wooden, poſterity of, ditto, 47.
William and Mary, great ſeal of, T. Vol. I. 1.
World, map of, end of T. Vol. II.

BOOK-BINDERS will pleaſe to obſerve, that if more than a quarter of an inch is cut off the Margin, the pages being ſo large, the Work will be much injured. The Numbers to be neatly folded.

THE Metalic Hiſtory may be purchaſed complete from Tindal's Works ſeparate, with thirty-two half-ſheet Plates, containing twelve Medals in each, and put in blue boards, &c.

D'ANVILLE's Maps are in future only to be ſold in blue boards: Likewiſe the Maps of the Engliſh Counties.

13 JY 60